Summer cuts leave UMass in budget crunch

•60 faculty jobs to be cut over next 2 years;

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

A $20 million shortfall heralds a "year of austerity" for the University of Massachusetts this year in which tuition and fees have been pushed up by 13 percent while academics face savage cuts until 60 faculty positions are eliminated.

The shortfall is the child of a $16 million cut in state funding for fiscal year 1991 and a $4 million increase in operating costs.

Ten million of the shortfall is to be made up through a 21 percent increase in fees as undergraduates pay $244.50 more than last semester. Total tuition and fees for this semester was bumped up $303 to $2,431.25 for Massachusetts residents. Out of state students will be paying $566 more than last semester with tuition and fees totaling $5365.25.

Returning undergraduates will have to pay a $900 curriculum support fee each semester, $210 higher than last semester. The authority fee has also risen by $20 and the athletic fee has gone up by $10.

The Board of Trustees inflated tuition this year by $58 for Massachusetts residents. Out of state students will suffer a $566 tuition increase.

The schools and colleges will sustain hefty one-time-only cuts as well as permanent cuts this year to save the remaining $10 million. Over 60 faculty positions are to be phased out over the next two years as instructors leave and will eliminate the need for these cuts next year, said Chancellor Richard O'Brien.

O'Brien proclaimed a "year of austerity" for the University to avoid either dumping the entire burden on students or firing tenured professors and damaging the University's future.

"I think the year of austerity is something I will be proud of," he said. "We as a community will suffer in order to save the fabric of the University."

Honoring faculty contracts is vital to preserving the University's long term future, O'Brien said.

"Everything we do now, we do with an eye on how it will effect us for the next ten and twenty years," he said.

The schools of Public Health, Education, and Food and Natural Resources are the biggest losers with cuts hovering around the 10 percent range for fiscal year 1993. Physical Education was cut by 8.5 percent, Nursing and Engineering were both cut by about 6.5 percent, and Humanities and Fine Arts was cut by 5.7 percent. Natural Sciences and Mathematics took a 5.2 percent cut while Management was reduced by 4.8 percent. Social and Behavioral Sciences was cut by 3.3 percent.

Support and service departments will also lose $4.3 million and will suffer 57 layoffs.

Allocations for graduate student teaching assistantships have been reduced by 13 percent.

Also part of the year of austerity is a one-time 37 percent cut in the junior year writing program. Computing and library services will take a one-time $350,000 cut as well as a $545,000 permanent cut, $300,000 of which are cuts to the Library's book and periodical acquisitions.

•Budget cuts take swipe at Athletic Dept.

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Citing budget cuts to the entire state of Massachusetts, Athletic Director Frank McInerney informed the members of the varsity men's soccer, women's volleyball and men's and women's tennis teams on May 17 that the programs could no longer be funded by the athletic department and that they had played their final seasons.

However, as a result of efforts from the members of the men's soccer and men's and women's tennis teams, the sports, except volleyball, were reinstated for a "terminal season" after raising enough money through outside funding.

"The Athletic Department is no different than any other agency of the state," McInerney said. "Consequently, as one function of this Commonwealth, which took enormous cuts, we had to take our fair share."

As soon as the announcement was made the respective teams met individually, and except for volleyball, decided they would attempt to raise the necessary funds themselves.

"We were given no choice except to fight it," Brett Anthony, one of the leaders of the soccer program's fundraising efforts, said. "We took it upon ourselves to raise the needed money."

Once the money was raised, "they had no choice but to accept it," he said. "I think they felt the pressure a little bit and had to let it in for the year."

The money required for the soccer program to continue was $24,000 and $5,000 for each tennis team.

Due to time restraints, one of the first steps taken by the players of the three programs was to request initial contributions from their relatives. After which, the individual programs solicited various organizations, both private and public, including alumni for additional funding.

"When everyone heard our story, they began rallying around us," Anthony said.

"We were surprised they were able to organize as well as they did," said Ben Doherty, the chairman of the Athletic Committee of the Board of Trustees at the time. "We couldn't believe the number of people and corporations that were willing to donate money to bring back the sports."

Because the decision came so late, the players were put in a bind because it was already too late to transfer to other schools and continue their sports careers, according to some of the athletes.

"I take the sport seriously enough that I was willing to transfer," said Anthony, a senior. "But, it was too late. Coaches couldn't get us in because of application deadlines."

"We've been working on this for two years," McInerney said. "At an institution this size, there's no single person who has the authority to say we're dropping this tomorrow. The number of constituencies involved is quite large and quite time consuming."

McInerney said he made the recommendation to drop the four programs. He didn't cite a reason for his choice of which sports to

Lowell, SMU join UMass system in merger

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts added two new members over the summer, the University of Lowell and Southern Massachusetts University, in a reorganization of the state's higher education system.

This merger is the centerpiece of the reorganization process of entire Massachusetts education that Gov. William Weld signed into law on July 11. The plan also added the position of education secretary to Weld's cabinet, to be held by Piedad Robertson, former president of Bunker Hill Community College.

In addition, the plan replaced the Board of Regents of Higher Education with a 10-member Higher Education Coordinating Council as of September 1.

As part of the revamping process, Lowell will become UMass-Lowell and SMU will become UMass-Dartmouth. The schools join the Amherst, Worchester medical school and Boston campuses.

Terry Zoulas, spokesperson for Robertson, said officials favor the plan as a way of giving the five colleges in the UMass system more control of their own decision-making.

"[Reorganization] is positive — I think we'll see an expanded and improved UMass system," Zoulas said. "Each campus will have more autonomy, with fiscal distribution more in control of the universities."

Reorganization will bring more autonomy through a decision-making process that allows many decisions which had formerly been made by the Board of Regents to the Trustees of the colleges and universities in the system.

Zoulas also noted that this increased autonomy was recommended by the Saxon commission set up in 1989 to find ways of improving Massachusetts higher education.

The addition of an education secretary with legal authority and the elimination of the Board of Regents should allow for more coordination among members of the UMass system, Zoulas said.

"[Robertson] will be more powerful than past education secretaries," Zoulas said. "She's not czar over higher education, but she will have significant authority."

David Lenson, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said he believed the reorganization process will be ineffective until state funding for higher

O'Brien new chancellor of starving UMass

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Richard O'Brien, appointed to a two-year term effective this July 1, will preside over financial famine while he copes with a $20 million shortfall.

Despite the continuing cuts in the state budget for higher education, however, O'Brien said he hopes to return the University to a "stable financial basis" and create an academic atmosphere that will retain faculty and students on this campus.

"I want to develop a sense of who we are and where we're going," O'Brien said. "We need to create an atmosphere for people to stay here — the goal is [for UMass] to become the top public university in the northeast."

O'Brien said he will keep his focus closer to campus than his predecessor, Joseph Duffey, in order to accomplish his objectives as chancellor.

"I won't have the national obligations that Joe Duffey did, so I can dedicate much more time to campus," O'Brien said. "I have a strong acting provost [Glen Gordon] and expect a strong provost."

A search committee has been established to recommend a permanent provost, with a choice expected sometime in October.

O'Brien described himself as a "hands-on person" who will bring this quality into his position as chancellor.

"I try to get an intimate knowledge of what goes on [on this campus] and use this knowledge to see if we're taking the right or wrong course," O'Brien said. "I think you'll see an increase in communication between the administration and the other parts of the University."

One major issue facing O'Brien this year will be establishing the role of the Amherst campus in the newly reorganized UMass system, which will now include UMass-Lowell, formerly the University of Lowell, and UMass-

SAO director Carew to take 11-month leave

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

The controversial director of the Student Activities Office — in part responsible for the shutdown of student government last spring — will be leaving her post for an 11-month period beginning Sept. 15.

Irene Carew, who said she refused to comment on her plans, will be leaving the University on a professional improvement leave beginning Sept. 15, said Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne Vanin.

"This is not a departure from her post," said Vanin. "Any rumors that she has resigned or been fired are false."

Vanin explained Carew was eligible for the leave, saying she submitted a proposal for a project to formulate a student leadership development program, which she will be responsible for implementing upon her return to her post next September.

Student leaders have for many years claimed that Carew was incapable of working with the students, and has pursued her own objectives instead of looking out for student needs.

The rift between the SGA and the administrators in SAO began last January when five SGA leaders approached Carew, former Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson and former Chancellor Joseph Duffey asking the administrators to suspend the student government and allow students and officials to re-design the structure of student government.

The Student Affairs Trust Fund, into which all students pay $112 per year as part of fees, had become a center of contention for members of the SGA. Due to bickering and infighting, the administrators took the power to regulate the trust fund from the SGA and it was given to the SAO.

Along with this, student elections for SGA President and Student Trustee, which take place every spring, were deemed invalid and the creation of the Commission on Student Governance was created.

However, the election of Student Trustee Kevin Newnan and SGA President David Gagne was recognized by the administration after the studnets took legal action, but since then, said Newnan, Carew and others in SAO have continued not to recognize them.

Newnan said Carew and her assistant, Suzanne Jean, "cannot work with us."

Newnan said he has spoken with Vanin, who will make the interim appointment. Newnan said student leaders hope Charles DiMare, the director of the Legal Services Office, will be appointed.

However, Newnan said the appointment of Jean would not be welcome.

"We're better off without Carew," he said. "But [Sue] Jean has to go without a doubt. Her appointment would not be accepted, not only by the students, but by staff and administrators as well.

Carew had "contempt for student concerns and is actively anti-student," Newnan said. She ran her own agenda and did not hold herself responsible to the students.

"My biggest fear is that Jean or some other person will be appointed to that position without approval of the students. Let us put our own choice in there, so if they screw up, it's the students' fault and not some administrators'," Newnan said.

Newnan said Vanin had met with the SGA leaders to discuss possible interim replacements, and Vanin said the appointment will be made after classes resume.

Suzanne Jean, associate director of SAO, was not available for comment.

13 UM students to travel to USSR

Despite coup attempt, campus officials green light exchange

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The failure of the August 18 coup against Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev allows 13 University of Massachusetts students the opportunity to view unprecedented historical changes in the Soviet Union firsthand.

Two weeks ago, at the height of the coup, the status of the UMass exchange trip to Leningrad State Technical Institute, scheduled for September 2, was uncertain.

Barbara Burn, director of the International Programs Office, said at the time that not enough was known to make a final decision on the trip.

> "It's exciting [for the USSR] to become democratic and to see what people have to go through there, I have a chance to become ashamed of myself for what we take for granted as Americans."
> --Natasha Yakovlev

"We would not go ahead if we thought there was a danger to students," Burn said.

At the beginning of the coup, the State Department issued a travel advisory advising American citizens to defer travel to the Soviet Union.

The advisory warned that the "implementation of military rule in some areas, deployment of military forces and seizure of some public facilities, and the possibility of large demonstrations create unpredictable and potentially dangerous tensions."

The document however noted that no incidents of violence against American citizens had been reported and that all airports were operating normally.

On Aug. 22, only a few days after the initial warning, the State Department updated the advisory stating in the aftermath of the coup the "situation was rapidly returning to normal."

Although the department urged citizens to "exercise prudence," the travel restrictions were lifted.

Natasha Yakovlev, one of the students scheduled to travel to Leningrad, was determined not to let the threat of violence and upheaval force her to miss a chance to watch history unfold.

"I was quite sure that I was going to go," Yakovlev said. "[I feel] more excitement than anything else. I'm not scared — just excited to see things happening there."

Yakovlev, a senior Soviet studies and photo journalism major, has visited the Soviet Union in 1988 and 1983.

"It's exciting [for the USSR] to become democratic and to see what people have to go through there," Yakovlev said. "I have a chance to become ashamed of myself for what we take for granted as Americans.

"What you can get there with the American dollar is incredible," Yakovlev said.

Burn said that even under normal conditions, travel to the Soviet Union is often difficult to arrange.

"It's pretty complicated dealing with the Soviet Union," Burn said. To enter the country, a visitor needs an official invitation to obtain a visa, she said.

"If you send a letter, it often doesn't get answered, and it's difficult to send a fax because of the level of technology there," Burn said. "Also, it costs around $60 to send direct mail to Leningrad, and if you send a telex, maybe they get it, maybe they don't."

UM maintains S. Africa policy

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Despite the lifting of economic sanctions against South Africa by President Bush this July, the University of Massachusetts will continue not to hold investments or stocks in companies that invest in that nation, according to campus officials.

The University's decision to divest from South Africa was made in 1977. Clause 2-A of the UMass investment policy states that the University "will not invest in any company or lending institution which either directly or through its subsidiaries does business in or with the Republic of South Africa or in countries with similar apartheid racial policies."

University Associate Treasurer Phil Marquis said the decision whether to divest from South Africa lies at the level of the University's Board of Trustees, and that no movement has been taken in that direction by the Board.

"President Bush must see this situation from a different perspective than we do," Marquis said. "We've got to be sensitive to students — we're not going to make changes until they're constructive."

Mike Fleschman, a spokesperson for the anti-apartheid Africa Fund, said that state and local sanctions have a much greater effect on the South African economy than federal sanctions.

"State and local legislation is the major obstacle to reinvestment [in South Africa]," Fleschman said. "We've received an awful lot of support from state and local officials and from the activist communities since Bush revoked federal sanctions in July."

David Popper, a spokesperson for the Investors Responsibility Research Center, the Washington D.C.-based group that compiles the list of companies in South Africa which UMass uses to make sure its divestment policy is followed, said not to expect state and institutional sanctions against South Africa to fall off in the near future.

"Institutions such as UMass don't want to open up that can of worms until the situation has clearly and irrevocably changed," Popper said.

Controversy over the issue arose at UMass in April 1990 when it was discovered by the Collegian that the University held investments in 10 companies which allegedly did business, had business connections or had subsidiary in South Africa.

A memorandum from the Treasurer's Office dated April 10, 1990 outlines the ten companies in question and what action the University took upon them. Stock in Baxter International, Digital Equipment Corporation, Merchants National Corporation and Boeing Corporation was sold during the winter of 1989 and the spring of 1990.

Stock in Sears Roebuck, the Morgan Stanley Group, Delta Airlines and First Chicago was listed in the memo as stock "which [was] sold as a result of student protest but appear clean according to the IRRC." Stock in the Eaton Corporation and in Allegheny Ludlum Corporation was placed under the category of stock "where ownership could be questioned," and was subsequently sold.

The University still holds stock in Sears Roebuck and Morgan
Stanley, according to the most current UMass investment portfolio. The Board of Trustees decided to reacquire stocks in those two companies after a review of UMass investment policies reaffirming the University's use of the IRRC list, Marquis said.

"[The Trustees] agreed to sell stocks of the portfolio before we really looked at the situation," Marquis said. "Former Treasurer [Robert] Brand contacted other institutions and found the IRRC to be a widely accepted list.

"After all was said and done, the Trustees reaffirmed the use of IRRC," he said.

Gordon named provost

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Acting University of Massachusetts Provost Glen Gordon has a figurine of a small boy holding the word "NO" on his desk, part of a Noel salt-and-pepper shaker which broke in half years ago.

Little did Gordon know that when the shaker broke, the NO half would become a help to him in his job.

"When people come in here asking for resources, I feel like I'm always saying no," Gordon said.

Gordon, who came to the University in 1964 as a political science professor, will serve as provost until a search committee can find a permanent replacement. He replaces Richard O'Brien, who was lofted to the post of chancellor when Joseph D. Duffey left to take the presidency of American University in Washington, D.C. in July.

The search committee is expected to announce its choice sometime this October. Gordon has submitted his name for consideration.

"If things don't work out, I'll be more than happy to go back to my position as dean of the Faculty of Social and Behavioral Sciences," Gordon said.

Gordon's job as provost is complicated by the fact that this is fourth straight year that the higher education budget in Massachusetts has been cut.

"In normal times, the provost's role is to recruit faculty and oversee academic matters on campus," Gordon said. "In abnormal times, the role is to be a close advisor to the chancellor.

"I expect to spend a great deal of time with the chancellor, working out short-term and long-term plans as the University carves out its mission."

Gordon has spent the last 27 years at UMass including three years as the political science department executive officer. He stayed at his post of department chair for 14 years, while also serving as the acting dean of the Faculty of Social and Behavioral Sciences from 1975 to 1976. Gordon became the permanent dean in 1984.

"I enjoyed my years as dean — I had the opportunity to do some good things," Gordon said. "Now, [administration] is not fun in a period of retrenchment. It's not great to be in the Provost's office with no money."

Gordon graduated from New York University in 1952 with a bachelor's degree in commerce. After receiving two master's degrees from the University of Chicago, he was awarded a doctorate in political science from that school in 1963.

In addition to his extensive academic work, Gordon's experience with University politics includes being a member of the administration's negotiating team during bargaining with the Graduate Employees Organization and the Massachusetts Society of Professors. He was also a member of the Campus Planning Council and is chair of the Public Service Council. From 1969 to 1970, he was secretary of the Faculty Senate.

Dartmouth, formerly Southern Massachusetts University.

O'Brien noted the Amherst campus, with 50 graduate programs, has far more graduate programs than any of the other four schools in the UMass system. One of his goals is for UMass to take a leadership role in helping develop graduate programs among the four other universities and to make graduate programs here accessible to other faculty in the system.

O'Brien's commitment to graduate work on this campus forms an integral part of his view of the appropriate role for a large university.

"The research and graduate character of a university influences undergraduate teaching," O'Brien said. "You need to make leading researchers available to undergraduates and not split the university into two things, a graduate and an undergraduate thing.

"There's a spirit about a research university of strong intellectual content," O'Brien said. "A student graduating has a sense of contact with the leadership community.

"It makes students better people — the fame of the university helps them to get jobs or to continue their academic careers."

O'Brien came to the University as provost and executive vice chancellor in 1984. Prior to that, he was a faculty member at Cornell University from 1960 to 1978, where he became chairman of the biochemistry department.

O'Brien served as provost at the University of Rochester from 1978 to 1984, where he was also a biology professor.

Although O'Brien's position as chancellor only runs for two years, he indicated that he does not intend to become a candidate for the permanent position. The Board of Trustees is expected to begin its search for a new chancellor sometime next year.

"We'll see what the next two years bring," O'Brien said. "There will be plenty to worry about over that period."

O'Brien also indicated that he plans to go on sabbatical the year after his term as chancellor ends.

O'Brien will receive $123,500 per year, the same amount he received as Provost and Executive Vice Chancellor.

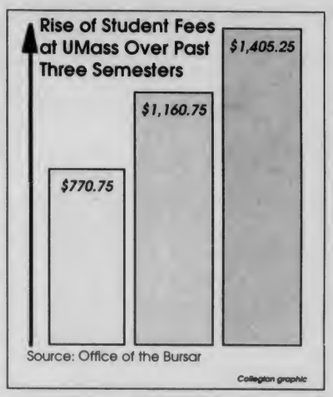
wiped out in 1992 and the future of the major is doubtful said Robert G. Helgesen, dean of the School of Food and Natural Resources earlier this summer. The four professors that make up the department will be transferred to fill vacancies in other departments in the school.

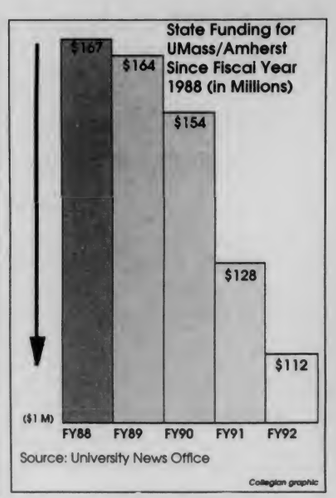
If canceled, Leisure Studies will be the second major to fall before the budget scythe. Last year, the Food Engineering was eliminated and, similarly, the professors were transferred to other departments within the School of Food and Natural Resources. In that case, the major was eliminated also.

The administration prepared the "ABC list" this summer to organize departments into three levels of excellence in order to decide which school would receive the largest cuts. The strongest departments would be awarded an "A" rating, while the weakest would get a "C" rating. The schools with the more "C" and "B" departments were given a "unprotected" status and given the most substantial cuts.

O'Brien refused to say which departments received which rating or which schools received which status. He said that the lists have been shown to some of the Faculty Senate leadership, but that public release would only stir bickering among the schools.

"We don't want to make public these ABC lists because they would provoke all sorts of squabbling over who made these judgements and why," he said.





LBGA offers services, assistance

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

Students who are returning to campus as gay, lesbian, or bisexual, or who desire information about different sexual orientations, have available to them a wide variety of programs and services, from rap groups to private counseling services and media resources.

The Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance, located in 413B in the Student Union Building, is a registered student organization dedicated to improving the quality of life for GLB students, Sullivan said.

"Most students know about our dances, which are held once a month," LBGA media coordinator Sean Sullivan said, "But we have a variety of other programs, including GLB rap groups for women and African/Latin/Asian/Native American students."

The LBGA Office coordinates many social activities for the GLB community and Sullivan said "the office is almost always open."

In addition to LBGA activities, GLB students can take advantage of the Program for GLB Concerns. Located in Crampton Residence Hall in Southwest, "it's a wonderful place to go for research and things like referrals," Sullivan said.

"Basically, for GLB students, or even someone studying GLB issues, it's like one-stop shopping," Sullivan said. "The Program documents and tracks all homophobic incidents on campus and issues reports about the quality of life for GLB students here."

In September, the Program will hold training sessions for its Speaker's Bureau, a pool of GLB students who speak about their lives to a variety of student groups upon request. Interested students are encouraged to call the Program for more information, according to a Program spokesperson.

A Speaker's Bureau member, Sullivan said "In the LBGA, I do have opportunities to talk to people, but more often, I communicate on paper. When I'm on a Speakers' Bureau panel, it's different — face-to-face and much more personal. Since it's an incredible opportunity to get my feelings across, I'm very honest, even blunt. And I have a great time doing it."

The Program will also be sponsoring a mural contest, the Program spokesperson said. Interested artists are invited to submit a sketch of a gay theme for the brick wall outside the Program office. Submissions are due by September 27 and the winning artist will receive $250. For more information, students should call Program Coordinator Felice Yeskel at 545-4824.

The Program, like the LBGA, schedules social events, which include a weekly film series and Coffee houses.

Another registered student organization, the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Counseling Collective, offers safe space where GLB students can discuss coming out and other issues.

"The Collective is an incredible place to begin the coming-out process. The office is comfortable, the peer counselors are supportive, understanding and friendly," Sullivan said.

Sullivan said GLB students at UMass have many resources that are not found at other colleges.

"Very few institutions have something like the Program, or for that matter, a GLB student group that gets as much attention as the LBGA. If, as a community, we take advantage of that, we can create not only a haven for GLB students, but a training ground for the gay activists of tomorrow."

be cut, but did say there were "a variety of variables, involving a whole continuum of people"

The first obstacle for the tennis team wasn't raising the funds, but finding out if they did, would they still be able to play, said Tim Lipsky, a sophomore who spearheaded the team's drive.

He said the team was never given word that they could raise the money themselves and found out through an article about the soccer team raising money that they could do the same.

Sarah Nadolny, a key figure for the women's tennis team said their biggest problem was finding out from the Athletic Department how much money they needed to raise.

"It was really frustrating," Nadolny said. "We wanted to raise the money, but we didn't know how much to raise. They kept changing the figures."

With only two-and-a-half weeks before their July 1 deadline, the teams learned of the possibility that they could be reinstated and employed all options.

We were able to get a little bit here and a little bit there," said Lipsky, who got large dollar commitments from numerous corporations. "I spent every free minute I had trying to get donations."

The soccer team, which had to raise the most, took their fundraising all over the country. They included national soccer organizations, alumni and other universities, labeling them all, "The Friends of the Sport of Soccer."

Nadolny said the majority of their contributions came from parents of members of the team, but did receive donations from two separate corporations of $500 each.

After learning about the "enormous desire" of the teams to reinstate the programs, Doherty went before the Alumni Board with a proposition to develop an "incentive grant" for the teams.

On June 15, the grant was passed by the Alumni Board of Directors authorizing $3,000 for the cut programs. A maximum of $1,000 to go to men's soccer, the remainder to the other three sports, with no more than $1,000 going to any one sport."

"The thousand dollars from the Alumni was the key," Lipsky said. "It was responsible for bringing us to our goal."

"[Assistant Athletic Director] Elaine Sortino was shocked when we handed her the check," Lipsky said.

"We all regret not coming up with the idea [to fund the programs privately] ourselves," Doherty said. "We all learned a lesson from this. It established a precedent."

Each axed sport had players receiving scholarship money. However, the money was guaranteed by the department of athletics, said Carol Ford, an assistant in the athletic department.

However, according to the representatives of each of the three teams, the situation didn't occur without incident.

"There's been a lot of bad blood between the athletic department and us," Anthony said. "They didn't work with us or even encourage us.

"We did all the work. If we raised the money, you'd think they'd be happy to keep the sport. It's good for the school."

But Anthony said, "The administration made it pretty clear that they didn't want us to get the program back."

"Someone didn't want us to have a team," Lipsky said.

Anthony said he is now concentrating on getting more people involved to once again put the pressure on the administration for possible reinstatement in the future.

Mullins work underway, completion in Aug. 1992

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Traveling along Commonwealth Avenue, one can scarcely fail to notice the bustle of construction that will soon become the Mullins Memorial Center.

The large mass of steel and concrete will eventually become a sports arena/convocation center, housing men's and women's basketball and ice hockey, as well as a location for conferences, banquets and trade shows.

The most unique aspect about the center is that it is the first major project in the United States to be heated by stored solar energy.

The center will seat as many as 10,214 for concerts, with 9,296 seats for basketball and 8,134 seats for hockey. The number of basketball seats will more than double the capacity of the Curry Hicks Cage, where the University of Massachusetts basketball teams currently play.

The $44 million dollar project is being paid for by the combination of a $25 million dollar bond issued by the Massachusetts legislature and a $20 million dollar bond issued by the University Building Authority. The latter bond will be paid off by student fees estimated at $100 per year beginning in 1992 or 1993.

Construction of the building is being handled by Suffolk Construction of Roxbury. Chris Kaufmann, senior projects manager for Suffolk, estimates the building will be completed in August 1992.

The most unique aspect about the center is that it is the first major project in the United States to be heated by stored solar energy. This system, designed by UMass mechanical engineering professor J. Edward Sunderland and senior research associate Dwayne Breger, will be similar to systems already in use in Europe.

The system will work through the use of solar collectors set atop an underground clay thermal storage area, with plastic pipes taking hot water from the collection to the clay for storage.

Although Sunderland was uncomfortable about placing a dollar amount on the money and resources which the system will save, he said the savings will be "considerable."

The United States government has lagged behind European countries in developing alternative sources of energy such as solar heat, Sunderland said. Nonetheless, this project could serve as a prototype for similar systems in this country.

"There are many attractive sites in Massachusetts and New England [for solar energy storage]," Sunderland said. "There are many economic benefits for the region — it keeps money in New England, instead of going to the OPEC nations.

"Solar energy is secure from market fluctuations," Sunderland said. "The more we move into development, the more prices will come down.

"This is a field with important growth potential," he said.

Mission of student senate still unclear after dust settles

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

Spring 1991 was a turbulent semester for the Student Government Association. The semester began with a call for it's death and the creation of a new student government, but ended with a student election that chose to allow the SGA to survive — at least for now.

News Analysis

The Student Activities Office and the class officers attempted a complete revision of what most consider a useless and cumbersome form of student government. They failed in their mission after trying to bypass the entire system and the old SGA continues to occupy Room 420 of the Student Union.

At the first senate meeting of the semester, five class officers announced to the senate that they had asked the administration to shut down and restructure the student government. The Student Senate erupted into debate almost immediately.

SGA President Natasha Diephuis, Speaker Dan Chesnicka, Student Trustee Angus McQuilken, Treasurer Karen Talbot, and Registrar Rebecca Rudko said student government was deadlocked into useless debates and power games that kept it from doing the good for students that it could. They also said the students could not make the changes on their own because of the very weaknesses in the system that restructuring would hopefully eliminate.

Most of the student senators agreed the SGA was ineffective in working for the student body.

Student senators have distrusted the administration for years. Hostility between the SGA and SAO has become almost tradition. The senators felt a student government created under the direction of the administration would be nothing but a well-trained pup held on a leash by SAO.

The senate voted to disapprove of the officers' request at the next senate meeting and elected their own constitutional committee to draw up a new system of government.

Later that week, Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson announced while he would not suspend the SGA, he would set up a commission made up of faculty, the five officers and several student representatives to create a student government.

Madson left to take a position at another school later that semester.

The commission was to finished its work in May and the student body would vote on whether or not to accept or reject the new system. All student elections, except the student trustee election, were postponed until the fall.

Madson's announcement sparked further feuding within the senate which could not seem to decide on how to fight the administration or even whether they should.

The next senate meeting ended in a vote that would have passed the motion had there been enough senators present to make a decision.

For the next two weeks the senate's time was consumed with attempts to remove the officers and impeach the president. They succeeded in dumping Chesnicka and Talbot but could not muster the support for impeaching Diephuis.

In the end the senate coordinating committee selected the commission members and all were approved by the senate at the next meeting except for one.

Ever since Madson had announced the delay in elections, Northeast Area Government President Alan Van Tassel, who was in charge of student elections, had maintained he would hold elections as usual no matter what the administration said. The administration was going to hold their own election for student trustee at a later date.

Because the administration had promised to ignore Van Tassel's elections, some candidates planned on only participating in the administration's election to be held in May. As a result, in April, there were only two candidates for student trustee, Kevin Newnan and Ken Parker, and only one candidate for student president, David Gagne.

Gagne and Newnan won the Van Tassel election and as promised the administration refused to recognize them as the new officers.

But Gagne and Newnan took legal action, forcing the University to recognize the Van Tassel election. All of this was a disappointment for Jen Wood who had announced her candidacy for student trustee in the administration's election only a day before the administration caved in and recognized the previous election.

Meanwhile, the commission's work had come to a close and had produced a tentative government, only awaiting student approval.

Senators who opposed the plan campaigned vigorously against the commission's system and a ballot box in the Southwest Residential Area was even stuffed with about 400 phony votes against the new set up. The commission was soundly defeated.

Now it seems that student government is to proceed as if nothing had happened and the old senate will exist for the benefit of the student body.

International center gets new home

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

When the William S. Clark International Center burned down last April 11, the University of Massachusetts International Programs Office was left without a home.

While the office has been temporarily moved to the first floor of the Goodell Library, students seem to have little trouble finding the office. In fact, the more central location of the new office has actually served to increase the number of students coming into the office, according to Barbara Burn, the director of the International Programs Office.

Burn said the office is performing most of its normal duties despite some problems created from the unexpected move from the Central Residential Area.

"Nobody is being shortchanged — we're still providing the services that students expect from us," Burn said. "However, the morale of the staff has been affected, with everyone working overtime, without overtime pay.

"The burn-down has caused some burnout," Burn said, referring to the effect of the fire on her staff.

The office's current location in Goodell is a large, open area, with desks and files in plain view and few enclosed, private spaces.

"It's noisy, loud, and there's not much privacy here," Burn said. "You're a sitting duck — you can't schedule individual appointments, you can't say "no, I'm not here right now.

"[The move] is not affecting the flow of students," Burn continued. "Now, students in Goodell for other business may be tempted to come in to the office to get information about our programs."

Burn said the destruction and damage to many of the office's files have created inconveniences.

"Some files were destroyed in the fire, others were wet or smelled like smoke," Burn said.

She and many staff members took files home for the interim period, making it more difficult to find things easily.

Although the program's location in Goodell is temporary, a new permanent site has not yet been decided.

"There are a number of interconnected decisions involved [in moving]," Burn said. "If we move into an office that's occupied, then those people will have to move. I will do everything possible to see that we're not jammed into some remote corner of the University."

Established in 1969, the office had been located in the Clark House for the past three years.

"It was exciting to be in a building named for an early president of UMass," Burn said. "[Clark] got UMass actively involved internationally with Japan."

What Clark began in 1876 when he went to Japan and helped found Hokkaido University has grown into an office which now has six different exchange programs with Japan and over 50 programs throughout the world.

The International Programs Office serves up to 1,000 students a year, including those at UMass on exchange, UMass students going abroad and students from other schools using UMass programs.

Noho suit brings changes in treatment of female inmates

NORTHAMPTON, Mass. (AP) — The state has reached a $70,000 settlement with a former Northampton woman who spent eight years in prison after being committed for treatment of alcoholism.

Susan M. Hinckley, who now lives in Cangoa Park, Calif., called the settlement filed Monday in Hampshire Superior Court, "just magnificent."

"Hopefully, other women won't be treated as badly as I was," she said.

A judge ordered the state to change the way women committed on civil charges are treated following a class-action lawsuit she filed in 1988. The suit did not seek damages for anyone other than Hinckley.

Hinckley said she was sent to Framingham State Prison where she was strip-searched and placed in a cell with a woman who repeatedly recounted how she and her boyfriend hanged a paraplegic.

Her attorney, Steven J. Schwartz, director of the Center for Public Representation, said at the same time Hinckley was sent to state prison, men under involuntary commitment for alcoholism were provided treatment at a special addiction center in Bridgewater.

"The settlement considers all claims raised in her lawsuit. However, the state denies any violation of her constitutional rights," he said. "I believe the settlement is fair and reasonable."

University, local leaders join at kick-off breakfast

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Nearly 200 academic and business leaders from the local area gathered for the annual community breakfast on Aug. 27, an event that has become an unofficial kick-off for the academic year for the past 25 years.

The breakfast, held in the Franklin Dining Commons and jointly sponsored by the University of Massachusetts and the Amherst Chamber of Commerce, was marked by hopes for increased cooperation between the town and the academic community as a means to weather the current difficult economic climate in Massachusetts and New England.

"In good times, there's a tendency to take things for granted," said Daniel Melley, director of university relations and master of ceremonies for the event. "Now is a good time [for the town and academic community] to get together."

Keynote speaker Chancellor Richard O'Brien sounded a note of optimism for the near future, calling UMass "bloody but unbowed." Although O'Brien warned of the year ahead as a "year of austerity," he stated his belief that the University should look to the future in an effort to overcome reductions in the state higher education budget.

"The Amherst campus will move forward in its quest to make itself one of the best public institutions [in the country]," O'Brien said. "We're not asking to be restored to some life we had in the past — not to fiscal year 1988, but to a new University of Massachusetts."

O'Brien also predicted the state economy would undergo some improvement in the year ahead, providing a "good basis" for the restoration of state funding to higher education. Bonds between UMass and the rest of the four area colleges and the surrounding community would improve also, he said.

> - Chancellor O'Brien

"It's clear what the Amherst community does for us: it's a great place for faculty and students to live," O'Brien said. "There's also a great deal of pratical cooperation with the University."

Gerry Grady, retired director of community relations for UMass and long-time organizer of the annual breakfast, said he believed the gathering of community leaders helped galvanize the resources already present in the community in order to overcome current difficulties.

"There's a feeling here that we've bottomed out, so let's get moving on," Grady said. "People want to make plans for where we're going and not just gripe.

"We have to structure our attitudes that the students and the faculty here are good — we have the wherewithal to do this," Grady said. "Let's start well and get people going this year."

Empowerment takes a dive

For those of you who are new here, there is something you should know about this lovely campus — the students have no power over themselves.

Last semester the leaders of the student government went to its "advisors" — the administration — and asked them to suspend all student government's powers — for the sole reason nothing was getting done but name-calling and mud-slinging.

How did we get from the pinacle of self-government to the bottom of the playpen? Elementary, of course. Those who act like children are treated as such.

We, by looking back over the last 20 years, can determine what exactly happened to the movement which began in the 60s — called rightfully enough — student empowerment.

Gayle Long

The activism of the 60s, the Vietnam War, and all the repression of the 50s had many college students throughout the nation rebelling — breaking free from all the evil of of such atrocities as establishment and authority.

So, here at the University, where the Vietnam War meant a tumultous time of protests, take-overs and bomb threats — faculty and staff needed a diversion.

How better to do it than the give the students a feeling of autonomy — tell them they can help make the rules — as long as they are willing to live by them?

So, our beloved (cough cough) student government was formed. And, as all beginning governments — had the students' best interests at heart. They formed agencies and committees to see how the students could have an efficient and well-serving government — to provide services and entertainment to the student body.

But, as all governments age, so does the newness and naivete of the rulers. So, after a bit, there was in-fighting between the "Liberals" and the "Conservatives."

When students enter the University, where diversity and tolerance are stressed to the utmost, the hear folk lore of the Right and the Left — the Bad and the Good.

But, it is because of these people — the radical right and left of the political spectrum — that we are where we are today.

Today, we barely have a student government — people last year went to Student Senate meetings as a form of entertainment, when it is supposed to be acting on behalf of the 20,000 plus (or minus) underclasspeople on this campus.

In the early 80s through today, the only thing a student senator has on her mind is what party she is aligned with. Politics becomes her clique — views and ideologies replace the clothes, music and cars which bring high schoolers together.

It seems inevitable, at least to some who have smelt the odor of student government, that all people are categorized by their political beliefs — and those who have no views or seem on the moderate side are "squishes," (a term taught to me by one big bad conservative).

But for those of you who are new, and have always wanted the limelight of student government, heed some semi-learned advise — keep your opinions out of the Student Government Association and Board of Governors — and remember what the rest of the student politicians forgot:

Student politicians are and should be working for student empowerment, not forwarding a self-ascribed political agenda.

So, if you decide to be a politician, remember your constituents — not just yourselves. Learn from your classmates, and remember to follow your heart.

Life is less catastrophic when you put it into perspective

August 19, 1991 was one lousy day.

I spent most of that day here in my new office at the Collegian, putting together this page — or, at least trying to. My attention wasn't really on line lengths or spelling errors, however. I had other things to worry about.

I came into the office with every intention of writing a fire-and-brimstone diatribe against the state for raising my tuition again. I imagined myself a modern-day Johnathan Edwards, paraphrasing Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God and turning it on the Trustees, Gov. William Weld and the band of twerps we call state government.

But with the unemployment problems in the United States and chaos in the Soviet Union, $4,554.75 seemed like a lot less money than it had a few weeks ago.

A friend of mine was working for General Electric before I was even born. These days, people with training and experience rarely stay in one company too long, but except for two years, he's been a one-company man. He's put in countless hours of overtime.

But that dedication doesn't mean too much to GE these days. Ten years ago, Pittsfield GE employed 8,000 women and men in three separate departments. Now that number's been cut in half, and only two of GE's three operations remain.

It's funny how you never realize just how awful something is until someone you know is threatened by it. My friend's department is being pared back by close to 20 percent. When I see him again, he may or may not have a job anymore. Even if he escapes this wave of lay-offs, what about the 400 employees who don't? What about the next time?

Greg Sukiennik

This scenario has been played thousands of times in Pittsfield, but I had no idea just how gut-wrenching it was until my friend was involved. I wouldn't wish it on anyone. That is, anyone except the corporate executives who put profit first, themselves second, and forget all about their employees.

So the next time George Bush says the recession will soon be over, ask him this: "When's the last time you looked for a job?" Yo, George, I hear Burger King is hiring.

Well, at least they don't lock you up or threaten your life when you lose your job in the United States. If you're the head of the Soviet Union, however, that's one of the risks that come with the job, as Mikhail Gorbachev found out first-hand.

The fact that the "hard-liners" took power back is an unsettling one. The fact that a civil war may be brewing as I type this is even more unsettling. Already, Russian Republic president and reform advocate Boris Yeltsin has marshalled popular opposition against the junta.

What's at stake besides the welfare of the world's largest nation? Not much, really — just world peace, the balance of power and all the progress made between the USA and the USSR in the past ten years. That $4,554.75 seems smaller and smaller by the minute, doesn't it?

Perspective isn't always easy to come by. It's far too easy to get wrapped up in one's own problems and forget there's even a world out there. Our own problems and concerns dwarf major catastrophes. People go hungry and we fret about missing lunch.

Well, I'm still pissed off at the state for raising tuition. I'm furious at the University for raising fees when they promised that they wouldn't. (Hint for new students: never trust anyone from Whitmore.)

When I stop and consider what I have, though, it's a little harder to get angry.

Greg Sukiennik is a Collegian columnist

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

For anyone out there looking for serious and thought-provoking commentary on interesting and important topics, move along to the comics. The purpose of this column is to fill your college-educated mind with frivolous and useless little bits of non-information that even the creators of Trivial Pursuit refused to deal with for lack of merit.

Budget cuts and tuition hikes suck it's true, but be glad you don't wear a democratic presidential running shoe. (Yes it rhymes, sue me.)

WFSB/TV3 made some programming changes recently. "Pee Wee's Playhouse" was bumped in favor of "The Little Rascals." "The Dating Game" or "Studs" might have been more appropriate. If Pee Wee had hosted either of these shows maybe his story would have had a happier ending and less suited for ABC's next movie of the week and the Enquirer's back to school edition.

If "Cop Rock" doesn't prove to you that TV is dead, WFSB/TV3 replaced "Rocky & Bullwinkle" with "The Hogan Family."

"Runaway With The Rich And Famous" got the boot and "Invisions-Hair Replacement" was put in its spot. Sort of like trying to decide who's more of a musician, Slim Whitman or Vanilla Ice?

UMass Professor Richard Mudgett did research this summer to determine how to make microwave cooking safer. Mudgett classifies food into three categories based on shape: cylinder, sphere and slab, or box. I wonder if the dining commons chefs classify food this way.

Bud Light, Bud Dry, or plain old Budwieser? Not the usual decision your faced with standing in front of the soda machine but the Brewery Investment Group plans on marketing the "Tally Ho! Tavern" (tm). This system would allow adults to buy their favorite brew from coinless dispensing machines. After first paying and being identified as adults by a nearby cashier, patrons would receive their mind-altering but not totally without merit beverages from the "soda machine." Why is this convenient? I don't know. You still have to be 21 to drink (legally).

Is Robert Strauss a good choice for the United States' ambassador to the Soviet Union? Jeanne Dixon seems to think so. Dixon also believes civil war could erupt in Canada over its environmental policy, John Sununu will be the president's greatest asset, and there will be an outbreak of voodoo violence that will baffle the FBI. Can you really trust a woman who wears make-up like my kitchen wears wallpaper?

Gov. Weld attended the groundbreaking for the new Polymer Research Center this summer and was ridiculed by a crowd of angry professors because of the higher education cuts. I wonder how much he tipped his waiter at the Campus Center.

"Bob" is a stupid name for a hurricane.

The bits of conversations you hear as you walk through the Campus Center:

"But he had this dandruff all over his..."

"So I told her that if she ever told him anything like that again that..."

"I didn't know what the guy was saying, it was in some other language or something so I just drove by and gave him the..."

"...el hijo de un burro..."

"...break his fingers if they went any further..."

Here's a couple of totally random quotes that have no relevance to anything I've said so far: "Few people realize the skills, talents and education needed to manage a golf course today." Also, "You can build a throne out of bayonets, but you can't sit on them long." One was quoted from Boris Yeltsin and the other was written by Stephen G. Cadenelli. Mix and match if you want.

Clarence Thomas and the Supreme Court?

George Bush's selection of Judge Clarence Thomas to replace Associate Justice Thurgood Marshall on the Supreme Court represents a clever assault against the entire civil rights movement.

By choosing Thomas, an African American, Bush believes that he makes it difficult for progressives to oppose his candidate's record.

Superficially, Thomas's life seems to be a rags-to-riches story.

Born in Savannah, Georgia, in deep poverty, Thomas was educated by the charity of white Catholic nuns. He sacrificed and struggled to obtain a Yale law degree. But his rise from poverty to power really occured as the aide to Republican Senator John Danforth of Missouri. It was under Danforth's influence that the ambitious Black attorney's political views swung sharply to the right.

With Danforth's backing, Thomas was appointed head of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission during the Reagan administration. During his seven-year tenure, Thomas alienated African-Americans and other liberal constituencies by opposing affirmative action goals and timetables. Thomas rejected the basic economic agenda of the civil rights movement, by attacking federal initiatives for full employment and expanded social programs.

But his most outrageous act occurred in 1988, when he criticized the famous 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision, which outlawed segregation in public schools. In the supreme arrogance, Thomas declared that the Brown decision was based on "dubious social science." If Thomas had been in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1955, he probably would have sat quietly in the segregated section of that city's buses, instead of protesting along with Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King, Jr.

Thomas is also deeply opposed to women's rights issues, particularly the freedom of choice on abortion. Several years ago, Thomas commented favorably about an article which strongly condemned abortion rights. And in two separate articles, Thomas attacked the 1965 Supreme Court ruling Griswold v. Connecticut, which later became part of the legal justification for a woman's freedom of choice on abortion.

Dr. Manning Marble

Despite Thomas's conservative political credentials, it will be difficult to mount a successful campaign to block his appointment to the Supreme Court. Thomas is actually the black ideological twin of David Souter, Bush's first nominee to the high court. Mediocrity, not legal vision or moral compassion, is the outstanding characteristic of both men.

Like Souter, Thomas is no intellectual. Most of his meager published articles are polemics against "racial quotas" and affirmative action. He has written almost nothing on other important Constitutional issues. Thomas's silence on these issues permits him to follow Souter's footsteps as the so-called "Stealth nominee" to the Supreme Court.

The basic legal strategy employed by Bush is simply an extension of the reactionary agenda of Ronald Reagan. During Bush's first two years as President he appointed 70 federal judges, nearly all of whom were white affluent males. Less than 12 percent of Bush's federal judges have been females; only 6.5 percent have been minorities. Nearly all his selections have been hostile to environmental protection laws, civil liberties, the rights of criminal defendants and abortion rights. This represents an aggressive, conservative agenda to use the court system to destroy progressive democratic movements for reform, and to return African-Americans, Hispanics, women and others to second-class status.

Bush was so determined to pursue these conservative goals that he deliberately ignored "moderate" Republican judges from consideration. One example would be judge Amalya Kearse, an African-American Republican currently serving on the federal appeals court in New York. Kerse's moderate political views, however, made her unacceptable to dogmatic ideologues within the Bush administation.

Even the Wall Street Journal, no friend of civil rights and women's equality, has candidly interpreted the meaning of Thurgood Marshall's resignation from the Supreme Court. The Journal predicted that Bush would "nominate a conservative committed to continuing the court's restriction of abortion rights, its crackdown on the rights of the accused and its narrowing of other civil liberties."

With the selection of Clarence Thomas, Bush continues to advance a form of radical conservatism, repudiating the legal legacy of Thurgood Marshall. If confirmed by the Senate, Thomas would become part of a monolithic conservatism in the nation's highest court, threatening the entire struggle for equal justice in the country.

Dr. Manning Marble is a professor of political science and history at the University of Colorado, Boulder.

Polymer Center opens

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

Construction related to the Silvio O. Conte National Center for Polymer Research building, the University's newest research gem, has disrupted traffic — and torn up much of Governors Drive.

The center was named for Conte, the long-time area representative who died last February. Conte was the primary proponent behind the project. The University is one of the top institutions in the world for research in polymers, a form of plastic.

The $56 million building was officially dedicated on July 30 by Gov. William F. Weld and Corinne Conte, the former representative's widow. Members of federal agencies which largely funded the project were also on hand.

The ceremony was also marked by demonstrations by many campus unions upset at budget cuts plaguing the University and mandatory furloughs.

Governors Drive has been extensively torn up, as crews implant pipes leading from the cooling tower in parking Lot 26 to the site by the Lederle Graduate Research Center.

The piping serves as "chiller lines," carrying cold air brought from the chiller plant, which was nearly completed this summer, said a construction official.

A short walk down the road, a separate construction crew will begin the three-year project which will result in the polymer research facility. Federal financing for the building was acquired with the help of Conte.

"Conte was very instrumental in getting the funding, that is why the building is dedicated and named in his honor," said Fabian Trudeau, the chief project coordinator.

If all proceeds on schedule, the polymer building should be under way early this month, continuing the northern expansion of the campus.

education is restored.

"Reorganization means nothing until we start funding [state colleges and universities]," Lenson said. "Campuses were starving before this, and they're still starving."

The UMass-Amherst budget has fallen from $167 million in fiscal year 1988 to $112 million for the 1992 fiscal year.

"Long-range planning is really important, and I think this year is about planning," Lenson said. "People are putting baskets into place to catch the money when it returns, going under the assumption that things will be going better in 1992 or 1993.

"When you put together a new group, roles are up for grabs," Lenson continued. "This year, a lot of attention will be paid to mission statements."

Lenson said that this campus will continue to stress the message that "we are the flagship, we are the big one [of the UMass system]."

Weld's education council succeeds Regents

BOSTON (AP) — Governor William Weld's administration appointed 10 business and education leaders to serve on the Higher Education Coordinating Council this year.

The 10-seat council is to replace the Board of Regents as the chief decision-making body for Massachusetts' higher education system.

The council will supervise and administrate the 29-campus public higher education system as part of the merger bill signed by the governor this summer that added the University of Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts University to the UMass system.

Seven members of the Board of Regents have been invited to serve on its replacement: regents chairman Richard Wiley from Gaston & Snow, Stride Rite chairman Arnold Hiatt, Assumption College dean Mary Lou Anderson, labor leader Ronald Alman, hightech executive Arthur Gelb, Jane Edmonds, who was appointed to the Regents in June, and Jacquine O'Neil, a former Harvard vice president.

New to the council will be Paul Lee from Goodwin, Proctor & Hoar and James Bailey of Cambridge Associates Inc. to the new panel.

Piedad Robertson, the new education secretary, will be the panel's chairwoman.

Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci named the new council members on Weld's behalf.

U.S. troops delayed in Kuwait through fall

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration will keep U.S. troops in Kuwait longer than previously planned to provide protection for the war-ravaged nation, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

Lead elements for a U.S. Army task force from Germany began arriving in Kuwait on Monday to relieve embers of the 11th Armored Calvary Regiment, which has been the sole American combat force in Kuwait since mid-June, said Pete Williams, the chief Pentagon spokesman.

The administration earlier had indicated that all U.S. forces would leave Kuwait by September, although it held out the possibility of extending the deployment.

Williams said it was decided to keep about 1,500 soldiers in Kuwait "for a couple of months" beyond September because Kuwait had made much slower than expected progress i rebuilding its own security forces.

"It's a reflection of the devastation Kuwait suffered in the war," he said.

Williams also said the administration expected to complete an agreement soon with Kuwait on U.S. use of Kuwaiti military installations and the permanent pre-positioning of military equipment in the Persian Gulf emirate. He decline to provide any further details.

Rosenberg, Dagarin primary victors

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff
and the Associated Press

Amherst State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg decisively beat Northampton Mayor David Musante last Tuesday in a special primary to fill the seat of John Olver, who vacated his state senate seat to head for Congress in June.

In the Republican primary, Douglas Dagarin, 41, a Northampton lawyer, beat his nearest competitor by almost 700 votes.

Rosenberg, 41, the 6-year state representative, beat Musante by a 2-to-1 margin in the Democratic side of the race for the Franklin-Hamphire seat of the state senate.

The total for Rosenberg was 12,866 votes, and Musante ended far short with a total of 6,189 votes.

Musante, 60, who has been the mayor of Northampton for 12 years, suceeded early on Aug. 27 after Rosenberg beat him in Northampton by 550 votes. Musante's hometown is the only city in the 21-community district, which Olver represented in the state senate for 20 years.

Dagarin won his bid for the special election with 1,447 votes. Dagarin's two competitors, Georgia Parks and David Keenan, both of Amherst had a tight race, finishing with 722 votes and 801 votes, respectively. All three are newcomers to state politics.

Dagarin who lost a 2-to-1 race for Olver's seat last fall, is the only candidate to oppose abortion and gay rights.

Parks, 51, who is an administrator in the Worcester office of the state Department of Mental Health, pressed her experiences in working for state government and social issues, including equal pay for equal work by women.

Keenan, 34, a realtor, grabbed attention last spring for organizing a costumed squad of shovel-toting "pigeon busters" after Amherst officials proposed spending $125,000 to have pigeon droppings removed from the town hall attic.

In Amherst, voter turnout was 38 percent — with Rosenberg capturing 3,448 votes to Musante's 202 votes, according to the Town Clerk's office.

Keenan took the Republican majority in his hometown, with 337 votes. Parks captured 128 votes, and Daragin scrounged 91 from Amherst voters.

The city of Northampton also gave Rosenberg the nod, with 3,639 votes for Rosenberg and 3,089 votes for Musante, according to the City Clerk's Office.

Dagarin took 334 votes in the Hampshire County seat, with Parks trailing with 117 votes and Keenan even further behind with 91 votes.

Dagarin and Rosenberg square off for the remaining 16 months of Olver's term in a special election on Sept. 24.

The senate district includes 11 communities in Hampshire County and 10 in Franklin County.

Olver left the post in June after being elected to the U.S. Senate in a special election to fill the seat of the late Silvio O. Conte of Pittsfield.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR ALL FOREIGN STUDENTS AND SCHOLARS

As you may know, a fire on 11 April 1991 destroyed the William S. Clark International Center which had housed the entire International Programs Office. Since that date, the International Programs Office - which includes the Office of Foreign Students and Scholars has been located in the North Reading Room of the Goodell Library. Effective with the start of the Fall 1991 Semester, there will be some changes in office function and staff location as follows:

1. The International Programs Office will remain in the Goodell Library and, while full services of the Office of Overseas Study and Exchange will be available at that location, only limited services of the Office of Foreign Students and Scholars will be available in the Goodell Library. Most of the Foreign Student Advisors will be located in MIDDLESEX HOUSE and we ask that foreign students and scholars observe the following procedures:

A. If you need routine paperwork (for example, a certification of attendance, an extension of stay, a signature) which does not require that you see a Foreign Student Advisor, simply go to the International Programs Office in the Goodell Library to make this request. We will give you a form to complete and will have the necessary documents ready in 2-4days.

B. If you wish to speak with a Foreign Student Advisor by telephone, call 545-2843; this telephone - our main number - is located in Goodell and your call will be transferred to the appropriate person. If he/she does not answer the telephone within 4 rings, Voice Mail will intercept and allow you to leave a recorded message.

C. If you wish to see a Foreign Student Advisor AND IT IS NOT AN EMERGENCY, telephone 545-2843 and ask to speak with an Advisor to make an appointment. If you wish to see a specific person, please provide this information when you call. There will usually be a wait of 1-2 days for an appointment.

D. If there is an EMERGENCY and it is possible for you to call before you come in, please do so. If there is not time, simply go to either Goodell or Middlesex House and someone will see you immediately.

2. The changes in location for the Foreign Student Advisors are as follows

CAROLE CUMPS -	210 MIDDLESEX- Monday, Tuesday afternoon, Wednesday, Thursday GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Friday
JANET JOHNSON -	208 MIDDLESEX-Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday afternoon, Friday GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Monday
FRED SCHULTEN -	210 MIDDLESEX - all day on Friday GOODELL LIBRARY - Monday, Tuesday morning, Wednesday, Thursday
PAT VOKBUS -	207 MIDDLESEX - Monday, Wednesday morning, Thursday, Friday GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Tuesday

3. We ask that you not "drop in" at Middlesex House unless there is an EMERGENCY. We also ask that you do not make routine requests at Middlesex; we do not have the necessary materials to process them there and will have to refer you to Goodell.

4. If your requests or questions involve immigration matters, please be certain to have passport and visa documents with you.

We regret the need for this change in how our office functions and we recognize that these changes may create inconveniences. Our dual locations in Goodell and Middlesex are temporary ones, and as soon as we have a permanent location again housing the entire staff of the International Programs Office, we will be able to return to our normal methods of operation.

Cable television in dormitories gives clear reception to residents

By A.R. SANTIAGO
Collegian Staff

Remember when, on a good day, even standing atop the TV set and performing all sorts of body contortions in your dorm room could barely get you any channels? And even then the reception still left a lot to be desired?

The University of Massachusetts, with its tales of financial woes and worries, finally has something to celebrate these days. Or, at least that's what proponents of the new campus cable system are hoping for.

Campus residents with TVs will now be able to plug into the Housing Services Cable Network, at no cost.

With leftover savings from the school's new phone system paying for its start-up costs, students will pay nothing for this service. Operating expenses will be financed by revenues from on-campus laundry and vending machines.

Beaming its signal from the roof of Washington Residential Hall in Southwest, HSCN will be providing its campus audience with a host of channels from area stations as well as educational programs put together by HSCN's production coordinator, Laurel Hellerstein — with crystal clear reception to boot.

A 24-hour bulletin board will list dining hall menus, athletic events, upcoming entertainment activities and many more, said project organizers.

Another channel will show short films on such topics as study techniques and recent developments in AIDS research. There will also be a movie channel for those dying for a taste of HBO or Cinemax.

HSCN is still working to include more educational programming for faculty and students into its lineup. The cable network has already produced short segments about prominent professors on campus to acquaint students with them and personalize what is an otherwise impersonal institution.

Joseph A. Zannini, executive director of Housing Services, touts HSCN as a potential innovator in campus communication and supplemental education.

HSCN will be a vehicle for UMass students to learn more about their university and, therefore, get more out of their college experience, Zannini said.

He added that the ultimate measure of the success of this endeavor will rest solely on "what students get out of it."

"I realize that not everybody is going to use it, but if they know what we are offering and they see it often enough, then they will eventually learn something," he said.

Zannini said he hopes to have the Cable News Network and C-SPAN installed soon, with the help of funds raised by the Residential Students Association.

UMass begins new program in recycling

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

As the fall semester begins, the University of Massachusetts will be starting the most ambitious and extensive recycling program to date.

In addition to recycling newsprint as in past years, all students will be encouraged to recycle their mixed paper, glass, aluminum and tin, plastic bottles and cardboard, according to Sherill Baldwin, the program coordinator for the student-run Housing Services' Residential Recycling Program, which has developed this comprehensive program.

The recycling process is simple. Every room in the University's 41 residence halls will have a recycling box. Students will place their mixed paper and containers in the box and will be required to sort the recyclables at central collection sites in the various residence halls.

At this point, recycling program student ""runners" will place the barrels on the curb to be collected by the newly formed Office of Solid Waste Management, brought to a transfer station on campus, and finally, hauled to the state-owned Materials Recovery Facility in Springfield.

Baldwin hopes to recover 25-30 percent of student recyclables in the next academic year.

Not only will the University save money by avoiding costly landfill fees through the program, but also make students more environmentally conscious, Baldwin said, and offer students a means of "making an impact on the solid waste crisis."

According to the Residential Recycling Program, 75.89 tons of recyclables were recovered in the residence halls last year. With the recent expansion of the recycling program, Baldwin hopes to collect 700 tons this year, a near ten-fold increase in trash diverted to recycling. Such a high collection rate, about 40 percent, could save the University close to $45,000 in avoided landfill fees.

Baldwin, excited about the expansion of the program, says the enormous size of the University makes recycling a difficult venture. Still, she maintains her optimism.

Baldwin envisons a "top-notch" residential recycling program at the University in 10 years.

"We'll probably be a top-notch program," she said. "But it's going to be a slow process getting to that point."

UMass professor received NASA grant

By ADAM MCCLORY
Collegian Correspondent

After receiving her degree in exercise science from the University of Massachusetts, Priscilla Clarkson decided she would love nothing more than furthering her study in this satisfying field.

Clarkson decided to start her career in familiar surroundings; she became a faculty member of the Exercise Science Department at UMass in 1977.

Over the past 15 years, the Clarkson has taught students the finer points concerning human actions in a "biophysical context" — meaning the combination of anatomy, physiology and chemistry.

Such terms alone would be enough to scare dozens of liberal arts majors, however, when Clarkson hears terms like "kinesiotherapy," her mind begins to move as ideas fly through her head at breakneck speed.

The devoted researcher was rewarded last year with a one and a half year, $65,000 grant from the National Aeronautics and Space Association to determine the effects of reduced gravity on the human body in space and develop specific exercises to keep astronauts healthy and strong during lengthy stays in space.

Although no one particular incident sparked her interest in this field, Clarkson said astronauts have been complaining of problems related to the reduced gravity in space for years.

Despite the fact that no cure-all solution will come of the research project, Clarkson considers this "just one little step" in conquering the quandaries that are all too common in space travel.

Clarkson is focusing her experiments on the wrists and arms to simulate the effect of the low gravity in space by placing casts and slings on student subjects at the UMass muscle physiology lab. She hopes this will simulate the effects of extended space travel in a reduced gravity environment.

Afterwards, the students submit to a barrage of tests to document loss of muscle strength and movement speed and the increased fatigue of the subjects muscles, she said.

From the results of these projects, she hopes to arrive at a conclusion which could be used to create a regimen of preventive exercises for astronauts. Needless to say, Clarkson would love to continue her research, hopefully with another grant from NASA.

The UMass professor has been associated with NASA's Exercise Countermeasures Project for two years now. A group of US exercise scientists who collaborate with astronauts and NASA officials to examine the effects of extended space flight on the body, Clarkson has filled the capacity of both consultant with a team of experts and her present role as researcher with the project.

Clarkson said she feels no added pressure to quickly produce results in her dual role.

"With a research project like this, negative information is still helpful. When arriving at a conclusion, NASA will know whether or not to continue on a particular path," she said.

With technology improving at light-speed these days, it would seem that the spacecraft itself could be programmed to account for the effects of weightlessness in space, however, Clarkson believes the best way to tackle the disparity between the gravity on earth and space is good, old basic "strength training."

The Soviet Union is also plunging into this particular area of study, she said.

Soviet researchers have been studying the effects of long term space travel on the human body and have developed a space suit made of a material similar to that used to make bungee cords, she said. This new technology forces cosmonauts to use their muscles while living in the reduced gravity of outer space.

Clarkson, who has seen the Soviet suit, calls it "theoretically good but not comfortable."

Although the Soviet Union was our fierce competitor in the race to land a man on the moon in the sixties, the two countries are now collaborating in an effort to improve space flight.

Clarkson is not involved with any Soviet research, yet she has witnessed that "little by little there has been more cooperation between the two countries."

Asked if it was justifiable for the United States to be spending millions of dollars on space travel research while domestic problems abound, Clarkson paused and contemplated the question. She agreed that many problems at home need grave attention but still supported further space exploration.

And to Clarkson, there is the ever-present excitment of space study since ""we don't know what will come of it."

She hopes to publish her findings in science journals in the fall.

Pledge to help women's center

Everywoman's Center budget increased

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center received a $60,000 grant during the summer, the third installment of a five-year pledge by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health.

At the end of the pledge, the donation will total $300,000, a large part of EWC's budget which has been plagued the past year by cuts, according to Carol Wallace, director of EWC.

Wallace said funding will hire two professional staff members for the rape crisis program and fund corresponding operating expenses.

Located on the second floor of Wilder Hall, the Everywoman's Center serves women and "significant others" of Five-College students and community members. The center helped people over 18,000 times last year.

Because the center's public relations and outreach programs were cut in Oct. 1990, EWC officials have feared that fewer students will know of their activities.

The outreach program was responsible for printing and distributing brochures and flyers as well as staffing information tables around campus. The program was growing before it was slashed last fall due to decline in University appropriations, according to an EWC report.

Another victim of funding woes was the Bridge Program, which had been a vehicle to help women who suffer from other discrimination in addition to gender.

The Counseling Program was also eliminated last October but through fundraising by EWC, was restored in March. Services include short-term counseling, assessment and referral and support groups.

Five EWC programs continue to thrive. The Counseling Services, Counselor/Advocate Program, Educator/Advocate Program, Resource/Referral and Graduate Women's Program are still funded, although at a reduced level from years past.

Since July 1990, the Counselor/Advocate has provided services to 296 victims of rape, incest and battering, second only to the Boston Area Rape Crisis Center.

Everywoman's Center provides support groups, workshops, lectures, information, advocacy and counseling for a wide variety of women in many different situations.

A 24-hour hotline is provided as a part of the Counselor/Advocate Program. The number, 545-0800, provides information and help to anyone who has been a victim of sexual violence or knows somebody in need.

It is completely confidential and free of charge.

Hurricane Bob blows by the University

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Hurricane Bob left the University of Massachusetts mostly unscathed when the storm came rolling into the Pioneer Valley two weeks ago.

The hurricane, which heavily damaged other parts of Massachusetts particularly Cape Cod, caused nearly $1 billion of damage. Nearly all area residents lost electric power during the afternoon hurricane but it was quickly restored.

Many trees on the campus lost branches but with the exception of a tree that fell on the Worcester Dining Commons which damaged the roof causing $5,000 in damage, the University largely weathered the storm out.

All non-essential University employees were ordered home at 10:30 a.m. when Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci declared a state of emergency. Gov. William Weld was out of the state at a governor's conference when the hurricane hit. He returned within a few days to survey the damage.

University spokeswoman Karin Sherbin said the hurricane was "no big deal."

Sherbin said there was minor flooding in 14 buildings and campus officials told her five trees uprooted or fell down.

Bob has been declared the most damaging hurricane to strike Massachusetts in two decades. The last hurricane to strike Massachusetts was Gloria in 1985.

Some Cape towns like Falmouth suffered extensive damage and were without power more than a week after the hurricane.

Porcupines become focus of UMass wildlife study

AMHERST (AP) — How do you put a radio collar on a porcupine?

"Very carefully," declared Todd Fuller, a University of Massachusetts professor of wildlife management, who is using the devices to learn more about the habits of the quilled rodents that are the bane of country dogs.

Although they are among the more common woodland creatures, porcupines have tended to be overlooked by research biologists, he said. And most of the few studies that have been done have centered on fishers and the few other critters that eat them.

"I was surprised to find how very little hard core data there is," he said. "It's an animal that can cause damage to forests and personal property. But people have had no real incentive to find out more about them. They just shot them and tried to get rid of them."

Yet, he maintained the slow-moving beasts with a taste for canoe paddles, ax handles and other tools flavored with the salt from human hands, have much to commend them to science.

Equally happy munching on eastern hardwoods and western conifers, porcupines are good indicators of how other forest herbivores in a variety of ecosystems are faring, he said.

"And one of the best things about them is they are easy to study, because they don't move far and can be easily caught and recaught," he said.

At least in theory.

It took his two graduate students, armed with thick barbecue gloves reaching up their forearms, the better part of the summer to refine their porcupine bagging techniques. But, despite a few scars, Molly Hale and Sara Greisemer now have about two dozen porcupines broadcasting their whereabouts in the wild lands around the Quabbin Reservoir.

"We have been quilled quite a few times, but nothing serious like a whack from the tail," said Hale. "The quills relax when they are anesthetized so they are fairly easy to work with. But there were one of two that got too small a dose."

"You just have to yank them out as quickly as you can," she said, of the barbs. "It does hurt, but if you don't do it quickly, they work in deeper. And then it's worse."

Initially Fuller hoped the porcupines would waddle into box traps baited with Red Delicious apples. Some did, Hale said. Others were entrapped in the stick corrals the students set up under likely trees, but the students have had to follow some reluctant research subjects up trees.

"We have a joke about them taking disappearing pills," Hale said. "You will know they are in a certain tree and yet when you look up you can't find them. Despite their poor eyesight they are able to sense where you are and scrunch around to just at the right angle where they can't be seen."

The drill, once a porcupine is in hand, is to flip it on its back to expose the unprotected underside and tranquilize it with a shot in the meaty part of the back leg, being careful to get flesh and not quills, Fuller said. The radio collar goes around the neck just behind the head quills.

"They have more neck than you would think," he said. "It's just that when they are frightened they hunch their shoulders and pull in their head so they look like big round footballs."

Eventually, he said, the researchers hope to follow 50 porcupines, both in areas where they do and do not come in contact with humans, for at least two years.

Their quilled charges display a lot of individuality, Hale said. "Some are quite docile. Others are pretty feisty and bang around in the cage and we had one that was just curious about us. She came up to the bars and sniffed at us as if she was looking us over."

The porcupines also seem to have personal preferences in the species of trees on which they feed. "Some like red oak, others we find only in white birch and still others favor basswood or poplars," Hale said. "When they come back to an area they tend to return to the same tree they left. It's as if those leaves just taste better to them."

Studies of museum skeletons have suggested that one of the prime perils of porcupines, which have few natural enemies, may be falling out of trees, Fuller said.

But Fuller bristled at suggestions that porcupines may not be the brightest of beasts.

"They are slow-moving and people relate slow to stupid," he said. "But they have no reason to move fast and they do live a long time (seven to eight years) so they can't be all that dumb."

WORLD PEACE. INNER PEACE. THE PEACE PAGODA

By A.R. SANTIAGO
Collegian Staff

If, after endless hours of TV this summer, you've finally given up on the world, here's one thing that might cheer you up: The Peace Pagoda.

Spend the day, alone or with a friend, to think, pray or put the world's problems in perspective. Sit by the pond, without 21,000 other UMass students walking to and from their classes distracting you. The path leading to the Pagoda is about 3/10 of a mile so it will be a nice, healthy walk, uphill.

I'd never heard of the Peace Pagoda myself until I was told to hunt high and low for it in the boondocks of Leverett, Mass. And hunt high and low I did.

Nestled on 100 Cave Hill Road, the Peace Pagoda was built by monks of the Buddhist order of Nipponzan Myo Hoji. The Pagoda, inaugurated in 1985, is one of 70 Peace Pagodas in the world and the only one completed in this continent thus far. Another is underway in Grafton, New York.

Its first temple burned down in 1987, and a new one is still in the throes of construction. (Help would be appreciated, say the monks and nuns there.)

A pile of small rocks that sits by the path leading to the Pagoda might also attract your attention. A journal kept by the monks, which sits on a bench outside for visitors to peruse, admonishes that these stones bear no significance whatsoever to the Peace Pagoda or its mission. They acquire meaning only if the visitors who leave them there happen to give them one.

So, there will be no need to genuflect or offer gifts to it. You can, however, add your own stone and make your mark.

I would give you directions on how to get there, but I wouldn't know how to unless I got you lost, too. But if you'd like to attend its sixth anniversary celebration on Oct. 6., I'd better give you a few weeks' head start.

A few tips: There are no signs to lead you by the hand to the Pagoda so stop looking. They don't appear until, wala, you're already there. If you've been going up a hill for more than 15 minutes and you start seeing trees with "Private Property' signs posted on them, back up. Chances are you are just as lost as I was.

The best way to get to it is, simply, to ask. The people of Leverett (and their Dobermans) are very friendly. Good luck.

Rough Guide to the Peace Pagoda: Take Route 63 North. Take a right onto Depot Road, in the direction of Leverett Center. Then take a left at the end of that road. Go for two miles until you hit Cave Hill Road. Look for a Pagoda-like structure on your right. This is, obviously, not the Pagoda yet, but bright yellow signs do appear as soon as you pass through it to lead you to the real thing.

Public universities less affordable, rising costs, shrinking scholarships

By LEE MITGANG
Associated Press

Public colleges are hitting students with the biggest tuition increases in a decade, giving less scholarship aid to pay for it and offering fewer and more crowded classes.

Elementary and secondary school funding largely was protected as legislators struggled this summer to close budget gaps in more than 30 states, but public university campuses were not so lucky.

A 50-state survey by the Associated Press shows that, nationwide, state higher education appropriations for fiscal 1992 total an estimated $35.7 billion, virtually unchanged from the $35.5 billion spent by all 50 states in 1991.

Eleven Western an Southern states that weathered the recession better than most are boosting appropriations by at least 5 percent. But 17 others are lowering appropriations, one state's funding remained unchanged, and 21 are raising them by less than 5 percent — not enough, in many cases, to prevent program cuts and higher student fees.

State colleges across the country are deferring maintenance, limiting or freezing faculty pay hikes, cutting back on library, computer and research budgets, and in some cases, laying off non-tenured teachers and administrators.

In at least 21 state, public college tuitions are headed up in double digits, the biggest increase since 1982, when runaway inflation sent tuition and fees at four-year institutions up an average of 20 percent.

Tuitions are up 40 percent to $2,274 a year at the University of California system after a 1.1 percent reduction in its state appropriation. Rates are 10 percent to 29 percent higher at Connecticut state campuses, and Florida college students will pay 15 percent more, on the heels of a 10 percent rise last year.

Mississippi state college rates are up an average of 14 percent — 17.7 percent at predominantly black Jackson State. And at the University of Oregon, fall rates are rising by nearly one-third: $2,598, from $1,965.

City University of New York, which in years past offered free education to generations of immigrants and others, hiked its fees by 28 percent at four-year campuses, to $1,850. The 64-campus State University of New York had its state funding cut by $54.8 million and is increasing tuition by $500 to $2,150 a year, following a $300 rise last December.

Fees for out-of-state students are soaring even faster in many states. Out-of-state rates at the University of New Hampshire, for example, will be $9,840 this fall, 30 percent higher than 1989 levels.

Such increases could thwart campus effort to diversify student populations ethnically and geographically, warn James Appleberry, president of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

Appleberry and others believe the unusually steep tuition increases and lessened state support aren't just the passing consequences of recession.

They view them as the latest sign of a sea change in the way politicians view public higher education:

For the forseeable future, they predict, governors and legislators will continue to shift the cost of public college education onto families, and away from taxpayers.

"Colleges and universities were once seen as driving the engine of renewal for the nation. It was almost a romantic belief," said Ernest L. Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

"But I believe that higher education is now considered more of a private good than a public good," he said.

Compounding the impact of rising tuitions are cutbacks in state-funded college aid that already are denying thousands of prospective students access to public campuses.

In Indiana, average state aid packages for needy student ate expected to drop by about 10 percent.

In Tennessee, 3,700 students who qualified for state aid didn't get it last year because money wasn't available. This year, an additional 1,700 who qualify will be dined aid because of budget cuts.

Even students able to afford school are finding access a problem in states where budget cuts are forcing campuses to cut programs and classed.

At San Diego State University, one out of every 10 class sections was eliminated after the campus lost nearly one-tenth of its $200 million budget due to state cuts. Officials estimate that more than 1,100 students did not get a single class they requested this fall.

The University of Minnesota is laying off about 500 employees and raising resident undergraduate tuition by 9.3 percent to help deal with appropriation that are $50 million less than last year.

"Students have no idea how they're going to afford to pay for the increase," said Stephanie Hanson, chairwoman of the student services steering committee for the Minnesota Student Association.

Denomination celebrates homosexuality

By GEORGE W. CORNELL
Associated Press

On a large sign in front of a national meeting of gay and lesbian Christians were these words of Christ from the Book of Revelation: "I have opened a door."

The implication in that particular setting was that the door of faith was opened to sexually active homosexuals, an issue wracking several Protestant denominations.

However, full fledged acceptance of that lifestyle characterizes the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, and its representatives demonstrated delight at it in song, laughter and prayers.

"Sweet Jesus, our brother and friend, we are thankful for learning to love," said the Rev. Troy Perry, the churches founder and moderator. "We proclaim your word, your teachings and your love."

He is a stocky, gentle-mannered minister of 52 with gray, crew-cut hair, a short gray beard and gold cross hung at the front of clerical garb, pleased with the vigor shown at his church's general conference here last month.

"I was delighted at the whole tenor of out meeting," he said in an interview. "Our people have finally reached the maturity that for the first time in our 23-year history we could open our meeting to the press."

"Some in the past had fears about being identified, but those anxieties have been alleviated and we were completely open."

The conference, with a reported 1,200 in attendance, included a full program of worship, business meetings, lectures, concerts and workshops.

A responsive reading went this way in part:

Leader — "There are different gifts."

All — "But it is the same spirit that gives them."

Leader — "God works through different people in different ways."

All — "But God's purpose is served through all."

Perry, once a Pentecostalist pastor who was excommunicated when he declared himself homosexual, founded the denomination as a haven for homosexuals in 1968 in Los Angeles, where it is based.

It espouses traditional Christian beliefs and considers the Bible the divinely inspired Word of God. It now reports 27,000 members and 264 congregations in 17 countries.

Perry said thousand so others attend services but don't list themselves as members out of fear they may lose their jobs or suffer other bias. He announced an evangelistic drive to recruit heterosexuals, who make up about 15 percent of the church.

Roman Catholic moral theologian Daniel Maguire of Marquette University told the meeting, "There is noting specifically heterosexual or homosexual about love. ... Don't be afraid of love, because it is the gift of God."

"Now we're back."

Jazz has a good summer

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

As usually happens over the summer, you take off from school, maybe get a job, pretty much do nothing, and lose all contact with the outside world.

Then in September you return to school, and BLAM! Suddenly you find that you are no longer even close to being hip. You still think that L L Cool J's Mama Said Knock You Out is a new release, and you didn't even know that De La Soul put out another album. Well, if that's the case, then you're in pretty sad shape. As for the bevy of summer releases that came out — maybe I can help you catch up.

We'll consider this my inaugural piece in terms of my column. I'll be writing about "jazz" (a term to be discussed at a later date) and blues, keeping you up on the latest releases, concert previews and reviews, and occasional commentary and criticism.

Tops over the summer were two major purchases in the music industry. Denon purchased the Savoy catalogue, and has promised to first reissue the John Coltrane/Wilbur Harden albums on compact disc. The GRP distribution company then purchased the old MCA/Impulse! label, and immediately came out with a plethora of reissues. The cream of the release was the four-cd set entitled John Coltrane Live In Japan. The music comes from Coltrane's storied tour of Japan in 1966, with his group of Pharoah Sanders, Jimmy Garrison, Alice Coltrane and Rashied Ali. Among the highlights are a 40-minute take of "Afro-Blue", and an hour-long take of "My Favorite Things". Also released was John Coltrane/Archie Shepp New Thing at Newport which features the entire 1965 Newport gig live and uncut (some previous takes from the concert had been scattered over several earlier albums). Also, albums from Oliver Nelson, McCoy Tyner and Stanley Turrentine saw themselves reissued by GRP.

As for new stuff, the summer did not fail to impress. Representing the older generation, Yusef Lateef released his Lateef's Encounters on Atlantic. Ellis Marsalis was featured on several albums. Tenor great Johnny Griffin returned to the studios after a long absence and came out with The Cat on the Antilles label. Also on Antilles, saxophonist Frank Morgan came out with his latest, A Lovesome Thing. Kenny Barron continued his recent prolific trend by releasing a solo date on the Concord label, as well as being featured on Reservoir Records New York Piano Series. Freddie Hubbard put out his Topsy-Standard Book

Tight dynamics make 'Boyz' convincing

Rapper Ice Cube makes his acting debut as "Doughboy" in John Singleton's film Boyz N the Hood.

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

"One out of every twenty-two Black males will wind up being murdered." So begins Boyz N The Hood, John Singleton's directing and writing debut. Boyz also marks several other debuts: the acting debut of controversial rapper Ice Cube, and the first time a movie of its kind makes its point convincingly.

The systematic onslaught and genocide being committed against the Black male is slowly becoming an issue at the forefront of the American consciousness, although the media has yet to pick up on it. In today's highly visual world (one need only look at MTV or the typical rock concert), the cinema has increasingly become a force for galvanizing the populace around certain issues.

The films Colors and New Jack City have both caused a lot of hype and hysteria, but have not come close to the hype created by Boyz. The cases of violence surrounding the movie are all too well-documented and, in many ways, are used as a promotional device. Yet after seeing Boyz N The Hood, one is bewildered by the fact that it has generated violence. Not only is its message so obviously anti-violent, but compared to many other current movies (Steven Seagal's Out For Justice, for example) there isn't even that much violence depicted. That fact, coupled with the film's perspective, makes Boyz a very dynamic film.

The entire movie is centered around the lives of three boyhood friends who grow up

More doctors recommend extra-strength HP.

More and more PhDs across the country are recommending Hewlett-Packard financial and scientific calculators to their students. And for some very strong reasons.

"The HP 48SX Scientific Expandable has powerful graphics tools that are remarkably helpful to students learning mathematical concepts. And with the equation solver feature, it's excellent for applying mathematics to engineering," according to Dr. William Rahmeyer, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at Utah State University.

"The HP Business Consultant II has an equation solver and extensive math functions. These free the students from computational tedium so they can think and interact on a higher level," says Dr. Lee V. Stiff, a professor of math education at North Carolina State University.

So go check out the HP calculator line at your college bookstore or HP retailer. You'll agree, there's no faster relief from the pain of tough problems.

on Alfa Jazz. Leading the pack was pianist Tommy Flanagan's Jazz Poet also on Alfa. A trio date with George Mraz and Kenny Washington, this album may soon become a classic. Some sad news: Flanagan recently had bypass surgery, but reports are that he is recovering. Get well soon Mr. Flanagan.

The charge of the young neo-traditionalist crowd continues to be led by Wynton Marsalis, who released several albums, including a three-cd set entitled Soul Gestures in Southern Blue, which has Wynton backed by a group consisting of Marcus Roberts, Elvin Jones, and Reginald Veal. The Tough Young Tenors, featuring Javon Jackson, released an album on Antilles. Pianist Stephen Scott has made some noise with his debut on Verve entitled Something to Consider. Trumpeter Terence Blanchard stepped out on his own with his first album as a leader, Terence Blanchard (it is sort of a tradition in the jazz world to title one's first album as a leader with one's own name), on Columbia. Yet album of the year honors may have to go to vocalist Cassandra Wilson. Her album She Who Weeps on JMT was certainly the highlight of the summer — it's a must hear.

On the "avant-garde" side (another term for later discussion) guitarist Sonny Sharrock put out Ask The Ages on Axiom, with Pharoah Sanders, Elvin Jones and Charnett Moffett. The brightest new spot in this genre comes from the Jazz Passengers, whose release Live At The Knitting Factory received wide acclaim for its freshly inventive and humorous style of music.

As for the music itself here in the Valley, we had our annual Bright Moments concert series on the campus pond. Poncho Sanchez and his Latin Jazz Band kicked off the festivities with a fantastic show, laden with infectious Latin-American, Cuban, and African-American rhythms. The Nigerian saxophonist and civil-rights activist Fela Anikulapo Kuti also performed before a die-hard crowd which braved some really crummy weather. Kenny Barron came and went with nearly no one knowing. He was a last-minute replacement for a gig at the Iron Horse in Northampton.

And, although it is a little far off, this years' "Max Roach and Friends" concert to benefit the Fletcher Henderson Memorial Scholarship fund in December looks to be a mega-gig. Roach on percussion, Yusef Lateef on reeds, Reggie Workman on bass, and Kenny Barron on piano (thankfully, so those of us who missed him over the summer get a chance to see this superb player).

If you want to hear the music on the radio, WMUA 91.1FM, the University's student run station, has African-American instrumental music (commonly called ""jazz") every weekday morning from 9 a.m. to noon. The Five-College radio station, WFCR 88.5 FM, also has a ""jazz" slot, from 6:30 p.m. to 8 p.m. each weeknight.

Mute plants the Magic Seed and harvests Easy

By PAUL DEGEORGES
Collegian Staff

For anyone who has ever bought one of those "self-hypnosis" tapes (you know — study better, stop smoking etc.) the standard warning that the cassette should never be played while driving a car, operating heavy machinery or at any other time, for that matter, when you want to retain "full awakening consciousness," is a familiar and relatively amusing little disclaimer which accompanies most of them and is generally ignored.

With the latest release by the Swedish Easy, entitled Magic Seed, it is suprising Mute Records didn't put a similar warning on this album.

Easy, who hail from the port of Gothenberg in Sweden, signed to a subdivision of Mute Records called Blast First and recorded this, their debut L.P., in a matter of only a few months. This is quite a feat for any band, but upon listening to Magic Seed, it is truly incredible.

Melodies and harmonies as thick as molasses are poured into your ears and blended with insistently hypnotic rhythms. Their sound has been compared to The Wedding Present, Dinosaur Jr., and The Cure. Really, they sound like a lot of things all stuck in a Cuisinart and whipped together.

To say that they sound like Sonic Youth is fair, but Easy is far more accessible. Basically, they write insanely groovy, grungey, catchy, danceable noise.

It has been noted that Easy are to be "complimented for not jumping on any baggy bandwagons and displaying a sense of dynamics that put more illustrious contemporaries to shame."

As for the disclaimer, Magic Seed really shouldn't be listened to when you want to maintain full awakening consciousness. They caused mass hypnosis when they toured with Lush and The Charlatains and have a knack for playing truly mesmerizing music.

As one reviewer notes: "If you can manage to be fragile, coercive, and melodramatic all in the same breath, then count me in for the next round."

So, if Easy is on the car stereo, be careful. When the tape ends you might find yourself driving 110 miles per hour wondering how you wound up in Vermont when you were only returning a video in Amherst. If you get pulled over and try to explain to the officer why you've got this glassy look in your eyes and your tongue is listlessly wagging out of your head, don't say I didn't warn you.

Thrashing Skumz are a groovy but esoteric experience

By MELINDA WEBBER
Collegian Correspondent

An uneasy, almost queasy feeling settles over a crowd of approximately 200 fans of that hard-rockin' genre of music associated so often by its legion of fans collectively labeled as "metalheads."

The hush comes not from the reeling sting of a final power chord struck at the end of a scorching solo, nor from one of those breathtaking, lump-in-my-throat-'cause-"wow these guys are really deep"-heavy-metal-ballads. No, it comes instead from a general sense of bewilderment and downright shock which has suddenly descended upon Hadley's hoppingest nightclub Katina's, in the form of The Thrashing Skumz.

The stage has just been illuminated by an intense flood of groovy lights to reveal the five-man progressive rock outfit from Amherst, MA., shielded by a frontline rhythm section consisting of the "lovely and talented" Prokopettes conducted by the Happy Valley's premier Glowing Tambourinist — Jovi. Together they constitute the foundation of the eclectic Thrashing Skumz: Jovi Prokopy's Fruitcake Rhythym Orchestra.

It is the five main Skumz, however, upon whom the majority of flustered gazes rest. They are decked out in bellbottoms and flare collars which might have been stolen from Sonny Bono's personal wardrobe, and enough hairspray that if any of them got near a spark, the entire band would probably look like the cover of Nothing's Shocking.

The lineup includes, on lead guitar "The Rock Stallion," on bass "Morris, (pronounced Maurice)," on drums "The Big Fatty," on rhythm guitar and lead vocals "The Cute One". "Bonita, Bonita, Bonita" rounds things out with keyboards, backing vocals and flute. Wait a minute! Flute?! Well, ignoring their outrageous stage show and ridiculous name, these guys actually play some seriously good alternative guitar rock.

What is perhaps their most popular song, "Alicia," draws comparisons to old Cure and Joy Division, but also incorporates a droning beat and thickly layered melody that keeps it from getting too gloomy and makes it a great dance tune. "The Pirate Song," which has a similar sound, instead incorporates sudden rhythm changes and ethereal vocals which, combined with a haunting flute line are simply mesmerizing.

So why are these guys getting yelled at to "Get off the stage!"? The show they are playing is a monthly Local Talent Showcase of some of the areas finest bands. This show included a slick, incredibly tight performance by the synth-metal group Rapid Symphony; the fast pace and in-your-face stage look of Bad Boy Trigger; and the funky, danceable grooves of the areas favorite up 'n' coming metal band Wonderland.

All these bands put on fantastic, nearly professional shows and ripped through their allotted 40 minutes with the look of bands that with a little luck might be touring with Mucky Pup in the near future. But without a doubt the band that stuck in everyone's head as being most memorable was The Thrashing Skumz.

Perhaps it is the subtly blatant poking of fun at the whole heavy-metal scene (which is the reason they give to explain their name) and novelty songs like "The PVTA NicFit Blues", "I Was an Ameoba in a Previous Life", and their most infamous tune "Give the Metalheads a Haircut", which make this band so entertaining.

They are certainly not a heavy metal band, as is evidenced by such catchy, dancey pop tunes as "The Frog Song" and "Scat!" and the irresistibly funky hook of their "politically-charged thrillers," "Jeff Dahlmer" and "Hey Pee-Wee!", but they do occasionaly show a harsher (and, apparently, actually sincere) side with songs like "Hallucinations" and "Zionist Baby".

The main impression one gets as the Skumz thrash their way through a set, with occasional pauses for a broken string or out of tune instrument, is that they couldn't care less about sounding professional as long as they and their fans are having a good time. That's not to say the band isn't talented, they just seem to have an attitude of fun about the whole thing and a little unintentional feedback is always made up for by an incredibly amusing stage show. "You guys suck!" someone yells. "Yeah," calls back Morris "but you paid six bucks to see us!"

Though the Thrashing Skumz are still far from being the Valley's next Dinosaur Jr., their second self-released cassette entitled The Gospel According to Jovi, shows tremendous growth and a knack for songs that really get stuck in your head. The Gospel, which is available at local record stores is definitely worth the time, and may surprise those who have only ever seen the Skumz live. Twelve professionally-recorded songs are included along with a "limited edition" autographed picture of Jovi.

With a combination of catchy guitar hooks and an amusing image, it seems the Skumz have hit upon a very appealing concept. But don't think that you should start taking the band too seriously. After all, as the song "The Other Day" reminds us: "Thrashing Skumz? Isn't that an oxymoron or something?"

Three County Fair is full of fun for everyone

By PAUL DEGEORGES
Collegian Staff

Hey you! Step right up! Really, I mean it . . .

Oh, well, it doesn't work for me either. But I do have to admit every once in a while there is nothing that beats going to a good old-fashioned fair.

This weekend, the Five College area will be treated to one of the finest displays of evidence that somewhere in America people still eat apple pie, play baseball, and go to fairs. The Three County Fair, held in Northampton, Massachusetts will wrap up its last four days in grand style.

Robinson's Racing Pigs will be just one of the highlights taking place Wednesday through Friday. For six years, the Racing Pigs have traveled the world — to Australia, Europe, the United States and Japan and they have appeared on The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson.

Racing Pigs? No, don't bother calling the ASPCA — these pigs (who can run at speeds reaching a whopping 15 miles per hour) compete in a race similar to the kind horses do. Only, the pigs have got it better: the winning pig gets the Oreo cookie which the whole pack has been chasing.

Two races comprise each show and there will be six shows daily.

On the more conventional side of things, there will be contests and judgings of such farm-related categories as horticulture, dairy and dairy goats, horse drawing, fruits and vegetables, poultry, oxen and steers, rabbits, sheep and swine. There will also be sheep shearing, ox drawing and more.

These competitions go on all weekend and will take place at varying times throughout each day.

Magician/Illusionists Gifford and Roy will dazzle you in their three daily shows. The act is directed at a family audience and will provide mystifying entertainment Wednesday through Saturday.

After a long day of forcing yourself onto those insane rides that can only be found at a fair — this year, being no exception, will feature the Sea Dragon, which stands over 60 feet tall, rises and falls at 35.7 feet per second and sways 65 degrees side to side (egads!) — you will probably want to unwind with the hip, rollercoaster-cathartic sounds of the South End jazz band on Thursday at 6 p.m. and the Mountain Music dance band on Friday also at 6 p.m.

More music will be provided throughout the weekend by Country music singer/songwriter Karen Roberts. Roberts will perform three solo shows daily through the duration of the fair.

The amount of things happening at a fair, if you've ever seen or even just heard about one, is usually pretty overwhelming and most times you wind up kicking yourself for missing something. I couldn't possibly list all the events of the weekend in this little column, so pick up a schedule or call 584-2237 for more information. Remember, there's nothing like a good fair because there's always something for everyone.

For my money, as long as I have one of those gigantic — and horrendously sticky — cones of bright pink cotton candy and get to see the 1991 Northeast Lumberjack Competition, which this year will be held on Saturday and will include both professional competitors and working loggers competing in over ten contests including: log rolling, two-man cross-cut, one man bucksaw, axe throwing and pole felling, then I'll be a happy camper.

'Til then you'll probably find me at the Apple Pie Contest breathing in the smells of fresh hay and fried dough. See you this weekend at the Three County Fair.

The Three County Fair featuring rides, food, crafts, and daily entertainment, opens at 10 a.m. daily. Admission is $4 adults; $2 children; Free under six years.

Impressive Ed Blackwell continues to produce

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

Over the summer, I had the opportunity to see drummer Ed Blackwell and his group at the Village Vanguard in New York. I was very much looking forward to this particular gig for several reasons. Not only did it feature the premier drummer of the sixties, Blackwell, who revolutionized the art of percussion while playing with the likes of Ornette Coleman and Don Cherry, but also because Blackwell has continued to produce music that moves forward. His music brings to mind the expression initiated by LeRoi Jones, "the changing same".

Blackwell has not rested on the laurels of his accomplishments — instead he constantly surges forward, finding new elements and musical idioms to explore. In addition to Blackwell, the Project, as his group is known, also contained some of the finer, yet more "unknown" (unknown to the public, but well-respected by their peers) artists on the scene.

Trumpeter Ahmed Abdullah has seen stints with Sun Ra and Rashied Ali, as well as performing in duet situations with dancers. He has also become a mainstay of the New York Village scene, playing with such musical experiences as violinist Billy Bang (to see Billy Bang perform is quite an experience), Andrew Cyrille and Marion Brown.

On this night, Abdullah gave a variety of stylistically different solos, displaying a wide range of playing styles. He rounded out wonderfully the one "ballad" type song the group performed. On the other pieces (the entire set consisted of five long explorations), Abdullah demonstrated his ability to play in a blues fashion as well as his sincere "outside" playing which emphasizes elements that are highly accessible for the listener. He will squeal, then lay an R-and-B-type riff (he played with the likes of Little Johnny Taylor and others), growl, hit a tremelo, and then use his harmon mute like a cup mute, giving off a Doppler-like effect.

Abdullah also has a wonderful air of confidence while he runs through this spectrum of ideas. He assures you, while taking you on a thoroughly illuminating trip.

Alto sax and flute player Carlos Ward also demonstrated a sound all his own, while incorporating a generous portion of musical history. He playing is somewhat reminiscent of Eric Dolphy, yet is own voice is a perfect offset to the trumpet of Abdullah. Ward breathes an intensity that acts as a balance to Abdullah's serene fire. His flute play is full and robust, not thin and metallic, and he seems to prefer the lower registers.

In dealing with the extravagant rhythms of Blackwell and bassist Mark Helias, Ward also had to deal with what I call the "jazz geek". The "jazz geek" is the fan who gets a little too tipsy before the gig, puts on sunglasses (in a dark bar), lights a cigarette, and proceeds to yell "yeah, yeah" at the top of their lungs throughout the entire show. Ward was momentarily rattled, and you could see he was doing his best to play what he felt, trying not to over-excite the "jazz geek" right in front of him, while at the same time trying not to turn off the rest of the audience. A seemingly impossible task but, to my surprise, he pulled it off.

In dealing with those extravagant polyrhythmic constructions of Blackwell, Helias provided the most stark, yet beautiful, contrast of the evening. While Blackwell played beats that were traditional Afro-American, Cuban, traditional African, Oriental, and some entirely of his own, Helias sent out beautiful long romantic lines that wrapped themselves intimately with what the rest of the group was doing. His two solos were simply fantastic, intertwining blues elements with luscious Spanish-like nuances.

As for the man himself, Blackwell steered this extremely diverse flood of musical thoughts with a casual precision. The combination of different percussive and rhythmic styles is no doubt the driving impetus of the group, yet the play of Abdullah and Ward provides a kinetic contrast which helps to drive the group even further. The Ed Blackwell Project abounds with a wealth of talent, and teems with an energy that winds up producing a sound not heard anywhere else.

Nice New Neubauten

By TODD BOURRET
Collegian Correspondent

Have you ever thought to yourself, "Boy, would I really like to get into Einsturzende Neubauten so I could be industrially knowledgeable and impress all my friends with references to exotic sounding songs like 'Blutverifung' and 'Kangolicht'"?

Then did you go to the record store and end up staring blankly for hours at the Neubauten section wondering which of the many releases would be the wisest and most tastefully-correct choice, only to leave the store empty-handed in a state of utter frustration?

Well, fret no more, potential fan! The perfect E.N. album is now in the stores waiting for your consumption. It's called Strategies Against Architecture II.

During the first 10 years of their existence, Einsturzende Neubauten has become one of the most influential and respected bands around, creating a starting point for groups like Ministry, Big Black, Nine Inch Nails and Sonic Youth, just to name a few.

They have managed to take popular music, shatter it into a million pieces and rearrange it to their own liking. The result is a dark, textured, apocalypse of sound.

Strategies Against Architecture II captures this feeling while documenting the band's progress from 1984 to 1990. It's not a greatest hits package — but rather a collection of previously unreleased tracks, live recordings and alternate versions of Neubauten favorites.

Now, to tell the absolute and honest truth, I had never really paid much attention to Einsturzende Neubauten. I thought the song "Prolog" on Haus de Luge was amusing, but I couldn't bring myself to sit down and listen to an entire album. E.N. is not, as their press release put it, "capable of making you so fully alive as when they send you crazily dancing along the Earth's faultlines."

They are, however, capable of putting you in a darker, more chaotic, more aware state of mind. Instead of "crazily dancing," the listener feels compelled to sit in front of the stereo speakers and be enveloped in the world of Einsturzende Neubauten.

The use of percussion and odd noises is the center of Neubauten's energy and creativity. Guitars and keyboards come in a distant second to the abrasive rhythms N.U. Unruh pounds out on metal sheets, jackhammers, razor blades scraped on mirrors, raw butcher meat, shopping carts, etc. Band leader Blixa Bargeled writes all the lyrics, sings and plays guitar. I'm told he's a pretty good lyricist, but unfortunately there are no full translations to be found on this album — just little snippets like, "The mouth is the wound of the alphabet/My screams turn back/To lick the wound . . ."

Bargeld uses the guitar as a noisemaker, coaxing sounds out of his instrument that no one else could possibly achieve. Bass and keyboards are used very minimally. One distorted, throbbing note often carries an entire song.

My favorites? I like "Z.N.S.", which features Blixa ranting and raving over snapping noises and big sounding percussion; "Armenia", one of the eeriest and least beat-driven compositions on the album; "Ein Stuhl in der Holle", a children's sing which proves Neubauten can be catchy if they really want to; and "Vanadium I Ching", which has some very nice processed metal noises and a synthesizer that's used as a drum.

Einsturzende Neubauten is not a universally-appealing band. They have been known to give nasty headaches to some listeners. But if dissonance, aggressiveness, and chaos are to your liking, then you'd better hurry out and pick up a copy of Strategies Against Architecture II before it's too late.

Carnival Art releases vaguely blueveined new album

Carnival Art

By PAUL DEGEORGES
Collegian Staff

The band Carnival Art has just released their latest album on Beggar's Banquet entitled Thrumdrone. Hailing from Los Angeles, the Artists sound like a cross between Pixies and R.E.M. The band collectively claims groups ranging from Men Without Hats to Twisted Sister and Bob Dylan to Kiss as their major influences.

Overall the album is pretty solid, but it is the band's attitude and amusing lyrics which save them and make Carnival Art more than just an alright alternative rock band. (And hey, they dig old Kiss, so they can't be too bad.) Definitely the highlight of the album is the song "Drop Dead", which is a rip-roaring slap at the Grateful Dead and contains an infectious guitar riff and some nasty anti-Jerry subliminals.

One of the most persistent themes in Carnival Art's album, however, is someone named Mr. Horace Blueveins. So, since they seem to be hesitant to reveal much about him, other than the fact he is just their "bad-tempered, wheel-chaired amputee neighbor," and since Mr. Blueveins has been so kind as to have written a little description of the band, well . . . take it away Mr. Blueveins:

"I've lived in Los Angeles my whole life. Longer than those Carnival Art guys who live next door to me — why they've only been in the neighborhood about two years. Act like they own the place, though. Once, I heard the boys practicin', the door was ajar so I just walked right in. Michael was whippin' around with his guitar, howlin' about some girl I'm sure already forgot him. This guy Ed was playin' a mean lead, smokin' a cigarette and stayin' outta Michael's way. The drummer, Keith Fallis, was poundin' away. On bass they've got this Brian Bell guy. Interesting character — skinny enough to thread my boot, but the girls go for him. Anyway, the guys were playin' with abandon. Didn't even notice me, so I just grabbed a six pack and headed back to my place. Heard them playin' all night, but that's okay, 'cause I couldn't sleep, and there's somethin' about Carnival Art's music that I just connect with and it sweeps up all my angry and sad and happy feelings and I just listen and everything's better. Louder, but better."

Well, maybe a description from a guy who Carnival Art makes out to be an absolute lunatic is going to be most accurate. It's hard to tell. Their album is as rocking and, at the same time, as vague as any you'll hear — It's not really recommendable. But then again, it's worth a listen.

No box office tsunami over Blue Lagoon 2

By TODD BOURRET
Collegian Correspondent

Well, by the time this review hits newsprint you'll be pretty hard-pressed to find Return to the Blue Lagoon in any theater. But, in case you feel like shelling out the money when it comes out on video cassette next month, I hope this article can be of some assistance.

I don't know how the writers and producers of this fine film could have come up with such a fresh, innovative concept as the idea of having two kids stranded alone together on an island, having to deal with the trials and tribulations of growing up and becoming lovers with no outside influences.

Wait. Does this sound familiar? A boy learning to cope with an ingrained masculinity complex, wet dreams, and raging pubescent hormones. A girl learning to cope with breasts, her menstrual cycle, and raging pubescent hormones. Sex in a tropical paradise. No! it's not deja vu, it's Blue Lagoon II.

Despite the startling sisilarities between the original and the sequel, there are some minor differences to keep you die-hard Blue Lagoon fans interested.

First, the bad news: the sex isn't half as hot here. This may be because lead actress and top international supermodel Milla "Vanilla" Jovovich is only fifteen and doesn't seem to have a body double.

The good news is that Return to the Blue Lagoon tackles controversial problems that the first wouldn't dare touch. These include rape and the corruption of pure innocence by a supposedly civilized and just society. I would go into greater detail here but do not wish to ridicule or poke fun at the power of the social message. As an added note I should say that the time both actors spent at the Bo and Luke Duke Acting Academy is evident here — classic stuff indeed.

Naturally, such an original and creative concept as this should not be simply ignored. But this film goes further, probing the complex social and interpersonal ramifications of societies in conflict, not to mention containing some of the most real and believable aquatic action sequences since Jaws. The disturbing human drama of the mother frantically striving to save her two "children" (the young boy is actually the product of the original Blue Lagooners) from a plaque ridden ship of which they are eventually to be the only survivors recalls some of the best shipboard drama of early Disney films such as Shipwrecked and Peter Pan.

If this sounds like your cup of Ovaltine, by all means check out this "gem." If not, this reviewer suggests you bag everything and just go rent the perennial classic Kiss Meets the Phantom of the Park and call it a night.

Growing up far from the restraints of Victorian society, Lilli and Richard find passion and love in a lush, unspoiled tropical paradise.

Power Of Dreams delivers great angst-ridden Celtic pop

Catholicism. Teenage Irish angst. Being too young to buy alcohol legally, leading to further teenage Irish angst. Girls. Being too young to vote. Nowhere to go. Nowhere to go with girls. No good records in the shops. Catholic guilt. About girls. More angst.

This is definitely an album full of youthful passion — the debut album by Ireland's premier tappers of the butchered nerve, Power Of Dreams.

Very few bands can come along and articulate the monumental hassles of being young and foolish the way Power Of Dreams have. Formed in that romantic but emotionally stifling city of Dublin, Ireland, Power Of Dreams got together at a ridiculously young age to play fast, punchy songs directed at girls they wanted to go out with. Some worked; most didn't.

The Dublin independent music scene at the time was practically non-existent: if you wanted to buy stuff by The Wedding Present, The Stone Roses or The House of Love (which Power Of Dreams did, very badly), you had to either take a boat across to England or wait the statutory six weeks until Ireland woke up to their existence. It was all very frustrating. There was also the perennial, archaic Catholic church problem with sex. Ireland's a country where the sale of contraceptives is illegal; Power Of Dreams responded by marketing their own brand of condom.

When Power Of Dreams's first, independently released E.P. A Little Piece of God, reached the U.K. in November 1989, it was one of those pop explosions where the fallout hangs in the air for ages. It was an astonishingly mature record for a bunch of teenagers to come up with, and as the music press duly flipped, U.K. record companies joined one of the hottest auctions of that winter for the privilege of getting the band's signatures. Polydor won. And Power of Dreams have sped through this last year; already the U.K., most of Europe and all of Japan have warmed them on their tours with The House of Love, The Mission and Wire. One U.K. music paper noted that "Power Of Dreams have a habit of blowing offstage any band that isn't nailed down."

We are now presented with their debut album: Immigrants, Emigrants And Me. It's already received great reviews in the U.K., being described as "Gaelic surf music with feeling." Songwriter Craig Walker is being described as "a writer to stand next to the best the Emerald Isle has ever offered up."

Basically: "a glorious mess of youthful frustrations, frantically-bashed guitars and the kind of sobbing lyrics that only the truly love-lost can deliver."

Produced by Ray Shulman, who also produced The Sundays's first album, Immigrants, Emmigrants And Me brings you the kind of songs you play in the morning as you polish off the rest of the vodka. The kind of songs your personal stereo was manufactured for.

The potential of Power Of Dreams is pretty darn exciting and by the time they make their fourth album, they'll still only be about 23. Power Of Dreams are: Craig Walker, singer/songwriter/guitarist and his younger brother Keith, who plays the drums; lead guitarist Ian Olney; and on bass Mick Lennox.

Power Of Dreams — "the acceptable face of gauche Celtic rock 'n' roll romanticism . . . and a hell of a pop thrill."

Blues grows in the Valley

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

One of the great things about the Pioneer Valley is its thriving music scene — you name it and you can find it around here. Specifically, the blues and jazz scenes are becoming increasingly popular. Bright Moments continues to do well each summer, and The Magic Triangle jazz concert series sponsored by WMUA radio is also becoming a fixture.

Yet for all intents and purposes, the blues scene is really just beginning to get going, which is odd considering some of the local bands that play in the area. One reason may be the "Blues Block" on the University radio station WMUA 91.1 FM, where you can hear the blues every weekday afternoon from 3 p.m. to 6 p.m.

Chuck Hamilton, a WMUA blues disc jockey, attributes the rise of blues in the Valley to something larger. "It's being revived all over the world. People are discovering that it is an ageless music."

The blues tradition is a long one, and there are many influences that make up the music being played today. The vibrant scenes of Chicago and New Orleans have spilled over to the East coast, as exemplified by the increase in local and college-based bands that are more blues-oriented.

"We need an infiltration of these styles" says Hamilton, in a violence-ridden area of South Central Los Angeles. Unlike Colors, which is shot from the eyes of a white police officer, and New Jack City, which depicts the glamorous side of being a rich criminal (yes, there are scenes of horrific societal decay, but they in no way grab the attention of the audience compared to the scenes of material wealth), Boyz is much more down to earth. It is this tangibility and accessibility which make it all the more convincing — Director Singleton himself grew up in urban Los Angeles.

The violence depicted in the movie is almost entirely secondary: gun shots, sirens and police helicopters are heard primarily in the background. Other than fistfights, there are no major acts of violence until the climax of the film: the murder of Ricky (Morris Chestnut). After that, the penultimate moment occurs when Ricky's best friend Tre (Cuba Gooding Jr.) refuses to take revenge on Ricky's murderers. The death of Ricky is perhaps the most compelling point of the entire film, for not only does it cement the breakup of a family, but it nearly drives the responsible Tre to violence after he refuses to do so throughout the entire movie.

Tre is able to refrain from violence because of the domineering influence of his father, Furious (Larry Fishburne). Furious does not give his son the typical "Go to college to be someone" parental patronizing. Instead, he teaches Tre that the Black community must resist the onslaught against it by realizing their economic power as a community, their ability for self-determination, and the fact that their situation is not self-manifested. Furious's character is a thoughtfully constructed, intense combination of Baptist preacher and Malcolm X.

Equally compelling throughout the film is the performance of Doughboy (Ice Cube), Ricky's brother. Doughboy is the complete antithesis of Ricky: he drinks, refuses to take responsibility, and is all too obsessed with the violence around him. When Ricky is killed, it is Doughboy who completes the savage cycle by viciously killing his brother's murderers. The following morning, however, Doughboy expresses his understanding for Tre's eventual rejection of taking revenge. He even begins to realize where he stands as a member of the community, and that the reasons for violence are empty and superfluous.

Perhaps the only weak point of the film is that all the female characters are on the periphery of the plot, and are never dealt with in the depth the male characters are. Ricky's mother (Tyra Ferrell) inspires Ricky to achieve his goal of going to college, yet when the recruiter shows up to speak to Ricky, his mother leaves the room. Tre's mother (Angela Bassett) sends Tre to live with his father while she works on her master's degree. There is a seven-year gap between when she drops him off, to when she re-enters the plot to make sure Furious is raising Tre correctly. The underlying feeling is the man is the man, and the woman is the mother.

Unlike Colors, which ends in abysmal violence and without the resolution of any problems, and New Jack City, which ends in the all to stereotypical failure of the legal system to convict its most vicious criminals, Boyz N The Hood ends with the possibility of hope, no matter how bleak (Doughboy himself winds up being murdered). In the end, Tre attends Moorehouse College, with his girlfriend from the old neighborhood attending Spellman College across the street from him in Alabama.

Boyz N The Hood is a tight, convincing and well-made film. While depicting the societal problems that are contributing to Black-on-Black violence, homelessness, joblessness, the breakup of the family, it does not fall prey to the symptoms of Colors and New Jack. It stays away from flashy editing, glorified depictions of violence and standard character development, and in the process becomes increasingly effective in getting its message across.

"more delta and Chicago styles as well as the pretty straight ahead stuff."

Local bands such as Wildcat O'Halloran, King Cod and the Blues Sharks, Wailin' Dave and the Blue Dogs and others all feature seasoned professional musicians who have played in studio and live venues with the likes of Bo Diddley, Matt "Guitar" Murphy, James Cotton and more.

Recently, Pearl Street in Northampton and WMUA radio sponsored the first Pioneer Valley Weekend Blues Festival, with two nights of four bands each. If the audience response was any indication, this event should become a regular thing. According to Jeremy Brown, General Manager of WMUA, more blues concerts should be on the way.

"We're looking into putting on some blues concerts. The success of The Magic Triangle tells us that the audience is there, which is great since getting the music heard is the most important thing."

Apart from radio and the nightclubs, however, there seems to be little else. "We've made some real good progress here in the Valley, but we've still got a long way to go," says Hamilton.

One place might be the University class room. Both the Afro-Am and Music departments here at UMass are very strong. The music department offers a History of Jazz class, where weekly lectures are given by such notables as Yusef Lateef, Max Roach, Billy Taylor and more. The class is taught by Prof. Jeff Holmes, who also leads his student big band on Monday nights at the Hatch. In the Afro-American Studies department, Prof. Archie Shepp teaches a two-semester course in the history and development of African-American music. He emphasizes the massive influence the blues tradition has had on today's rock scene by playing important historical recordings in contrast with today's popular music.

Hopefully, the promise of more blues here in the Valley will come true, and ideally there will be a regular venue for the music. Groundwork has already begun for a regular blues gig in the Hatch here on campus, to be run by Art Steele and his blues band. Not only will fans be able to hear good music, but musicians will be encouraged to sit in and jam.

As for buying the music, just about every record store in the area has a blues section. If you don't know the difference between B.B. King and John Lee Hooker, but you know that you're interested, probably the best thing to do is listen to the radio and find what you like. Or, you can do what I do, and just pick albums out at random; I've yet to be disappointed with anything I've picked out. As Robert Potts, WMUA blues DJ says, "The blues is life, the blues is . . ."

Internships

The Arts Extension Service (AES) of the Division of Continuing Education, University of Massachusetts is recruiting interns for the fall. The Arts Administration Internship Program provides education and training to people interested in gaining knowledge and skills in arts management. Positions relating to AES activities in program development, information management, and publications development help interns develop an understanding of issues and practices in the arts.

Interns assist with specific projects and activities related to the delivery of AES's services and programs. Positions include program and promotional assistance for the New England Film and Video Festival, coordination of resources in AES's arts management library, including extensive artists in business information, and desk top publishing and marketing assistance.

Working closely with one professional staff member, the intern has a role in the development and implementation of a project. One-on-one training is augmented by workshops which address arts management skill development, careers in arts management, and other topics of interest to interns.

AES's Internship Program has won an award from the National University Continuing Education Association for creative programming in Continuing Education. Numerous former interns have gone onto paid positions with art organizations such as Affiliate Artists of New York City; the DeCordova Museum, Lincoln; Stage West, Springfield; Holyoke Children's Museum, Holyoke; the Franklin County Arts Council, Greenfield; National Endowment for the Arts; and the Connecticut Commission on the Arts.

On September 5 and 6 from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. in room 204 at the FAC, auditions for Volpone by Ben Jonson will take place.

The worship of gold is elevated to a religion in Jonson's classic Elizabethan satire. Volpone and his sly servant Mosca plot against the greedy scoundrels who will stop at nothing to win Volpone's favor — and hopefully his fortune. Mosca is played by a woman and Volpone's three fools appear as a rock band in professor Virginia Scott's translation. There are parts available for 5 to 9 women and 4 to 8 men.

On September 11 and 12 from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m., auditions for Romeo and Juliet by William Shakespeare will be held.

Parts are available for 4 to 7 women and 10 to 12 men.

The director will present a post modernist production focusing on the nature of true love in an imperfect world. The star-crossed lovers exist in a fantastical setting that spans four hundred years, from the Elizabethan stage to the present.

Roles are open to actors of all ethnic and cultural backgrounds. Community members and Five College students are encouraged to audition. English Beat makes it Special

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

"Hey, have you heard that ska group Special Beat is coming to town this week?"

"Hey, what's Special Beat? Don't you mean the English Beat?"

"No man, I think he means The Specials are coming to town."

You're both right. Special Beat is the newly-formed group featuring Rankin' Roger of The English Beat and Neville Staples of The Specials. The idea was the brainchild of ex-Specials producer John Bradbury, who called Roger with his plan. It didn't take long for Roger to accept.

"It was like that scene in 2001," explains Bradbury, "when all the planets came into line and something wonderful happens." Something so wonderful Bradbury has stopped producing in order to start drumming with Special Beat.

Rounding out the group is ex-Specials bass player Horace Panter, who says "I thought about it for about five seconds - I was born for this." Birmingham-born Bobby Bird is on guitar, Sean Flowerdew will be on keyboards, and the third vocalist is Finny.

Special Beat is currently on a two-month, 45-date, coast-to-coast tour of the U.S. and Canada. Luckily school starts right in time to see them in the area. The strange thing is the Specials have yet to get on wax — incomprehensible due to the credentials of the band members.

So get your skanking shoes on, all you rude boys and girls. Says Bradbury, "I think this could be pretty big."

The Specials will be at Pearl Street on Thursday, September 17. Show time is 8 p.m. and tickets are $11.50 in advance.

Minutemen look to repeat as Yankee Conference Champs

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

At some point in the season, and maybe more than once, someone will ask Coach Jim Reid how UMass would be if they had Gary Wilkos back? So, let's ask it right now and be done with it for the rest of the year.

Coach Reid, what if Gary Wilkos were back?

"If Gary was back, then everything would be fine and we'd be looking for a backup quarterback," he laughed.

Done, finished, the end!

Wilkos, last year's quarterback, broke a vertebrae in his neck in the game against Delaware. The injury has at least suspended his career for this season and may be career ending.

The Reds.

Plain. Simple.

One of the most successful, yet unheralded, athletic programs at the University of Massachusetts is women's soccer, the Reds. They have appeared in the NCAA Tournament every year since the team's formation at the university, except for last season.

The Reds are hoping to improve on last year's 10-5-2 record and number 13 ranking. But first, they have some major obstacles to overcome.

"This year, we have more question marks than any other year, by far," said fourth year coach Jim Rudy.

Rudy's concern stems from the loss of six starting seniors. Included are leading scorer, two-time All-American and Hermann Trophy winner April Kater. Second leading scorer Sue Gaudette is also gone. Add to the list numerous injured players and Rudy is forced to look at his new recruits and several veteran players to step up and fill in the holes.

"It's going to be a really exhausting and interesting preseason to figure out what and who we have to get it together," he said.

Rudy has acquired Barbie Verdoliva, the nation's leading junior college goal scorer, from Herkimer Community College in New York. Another recruit, Heidi Kocher, is highly touted. She is from Lakeland High School in New York where she was a member of the East Regional Youth team.

Rudy explained that voids in several areas may be filled by players switching positions.

"We have a lot of midfielders that can go both ways, attack and defend," he said.

Junior Skye Eddy and sophomore Briana Scurry return to defend the goal. Eddy started nine games last season and finished with a 0.75 goals against average, including two shutouts. Scurry started eight games, tallying a 0.93 GAA and three shutouts.

Also back is junior Holly Hellmuth and senior midfielder Michele Woodside. Hellmuth is an outstanding marking defender, according to Rudy. Woodside had seven total points last season, two goals, three assists. Third leading point scorer, senior Kim Eynard (five goals, one assist, 11 points) is back to team with senior Tracy Arwood who is expected to start on the forward line.

Rudy criticized the new NCAA calendar that has taken away two days of pre-season training as well as three exhibition games.

Whatever the case, the Reds still have to face teams from what Rudy described as the "toughest region in the country."

The schedule includes 11 teams ranked in last year's top 20, commencing at Vermont on Saturday. At least five of the teams were in the top 10, including the University of California-Berkeley, Wisconsin, Central Florida, Hartford and Connecticut.

"I don't have many preconceptions about the season," Rudy said. "We're just going to play like hell and see what we can do."

If there is one predictable factor surrounding the team it is their philosophy of performing as a whole, complemented by their style of play.

"They're a bunch of structured, focused players who want to succeed collectively," Rudy said.

"We don't have a system," he emphasized. "We attack with 10 people and we defend with 10 people."

And the winner is . . . New Hampshire

Massachusetts picked second in YanCon

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Last year's University of Massachusetts football team was the first since the 1985 Rhode Island team to win the Yankee Conference outright. In fact, since 1980 when the undefeated Boston University squad won the Yankee Conference, only URI and UMass have walked away with the whole title. Since the conference expanded to nine in 1988 with the addition of Villanova, each year six of its teams have finished with .500 or above records.

So. . . once again there's this parity thing to be discussed.

In August, 28 members of the media who follow the Yankee Conference closely selected the University of New Hampshire as the overwhelming pre-season favorite to win the title.

"This is the first year that I think there's a pre-season favorite. . . a real one that a majority of the people feel will run away," said UMass coach Jim Reid.

However, after number one, the difference in votes between second ranked UMass' 193 and fifth seeded Villanova's 160 was slight enough to suggest that the press realizes what the coaches have been saying for years: "There is tremendous talent in this conference and if you don't show up to play each and every game, you're gonna lose."

"I know it gets to be redundant, you here it all the time about this parity thing but there are teams in this league who have as many starters returning as we do," said New Hampshire coach Bill Bowes.

Here now is a look at the teams who will be vying for the Yankee Conference Beanpot in the order in which they were predicted to finish.

1. NEW HAMPSHIRE: Coach Bill Bowes' club is tabbed by many to finish in the top 20 in the country at the end of the year. The Sporting News picks UNH 12th in Division I-AA, while Street & Smith's picks them 15th. Sports Illustrated picks them to win the Yankee Conference.

The Wildcats return all 11 starters to an offense which amassed 430 yards per game. Senior quarterback Matt Griffin is the arm of the offense and Yankee Conference first team tailback Barry Bourassa is the legs. Each is capable of carrying the UNH offense on his back through a Saturday afternoon in the Yankee Conference.

Griffin earned honorable mention All-New England honors from the Associated Press. He completed 59 percent of his passes while throwing for 2,283 yards, including 10 touchdowns.

Bourassa, an All-American candidate, led Division I-AA in scoring (10.7 points per game) and all-purpose yardage (193.9 yards per game). He rushed for 957 yards and 13 TDs.

Junior John Perry (51 receptions for 723 yards) and sophomore David Gamble (30-442 yds) are the two top receiving targets for Griffin.

Senior, All-American candidate Chris Porter anchors a huge offensive line which averages 271 pounds.

The defense returns nine starters including first team Yankee Conference selection, defensive end Dwayne Sabb. Sabb registered 16 sacks last season and 11 the year before.

"Being picked first is the kiss of death," Bowes said in August. "I kind of like being the underdog and sneaking up on people."

2. MASSACHUSETTS: See accompanying season preview.

3. DELAWARE: Heee's baaack. Harold "Tubby" Raymond is back for his 26th season at Delaware, meaning that the famed wing-T offense is back and will cause opposing coaches a few sleepless nights as they stay up late thinking about how to stop it.

Junior Bill Vergantino has become a perfect option quarterback in Delaware's scheme. Predicted by the Sporting News to be the Offensive Player of the Year in the Yankee Conference, Vergantino le.. .he team in rushing last season (691 yards) and threw for 1,528 yards and eight touchdowns.

He needs to gain just 279 yards rushing to pass Rich Gannon as Delaware's all-time leading rushing quarterback. A lock if he doesn't get injured.

The running backs are inexperienced. Senior Jim Lazarski is the lone returning starter, while junior Marcus Lewis earned the other starting job in the Spring. Expect sophomore Lanue Johnson to start at fullback.

"The offensive line is another question mark," Raymond said. "We have to come up with another offensive linemen or two to go along with our three returning starters."

Delaware's strong suit: Defense. Nine starters return, including senior cornerback Marc Syndor who missed all but two games last season with a leg injury. Add All-YanCon selection, senior Robin Callender to the other corner, move junior Tim Jacobs to free safety, and throw senior Jay Mirabelli at strong safety and you have one of the best secondaries in the conference, not to mention an experienced one.

4. CONNECTICUT: What's a team to do when it loses the all-time leading passer in the history of the Yankee Conference and the holder of 15 different school records?

"Wish he was back," said coach Tom Jackson.

But he's not. Matt DeGennaro is gone and that leaves a big void to fill.

"I think that the key at the quarterback position is the guy that can come in there and play with consistency and not be afraid to make a mistake," Jackson said.

Enter: Cornelius Benton. The senior started four games for the Huskies after DeGennaro went down with a separated shoulder in the second game of the season. He completed 105-of-163 passes for 1,184 yards and six touchdowns.

Is that consistent enough?

"Those four games game him a little boost of confidence," Jackson said.

Offensively, UConn's strength is their offensive line which returns in tact and their receiving corps.

The receiving trio is the best in the conference. Split end Mark Didio is the most heralded player on the team. In 1990 he set single-season-school-records in receptions (78), receiving yards (1,153) and touchdowns (10). He needs just 36 catches, 372 receiving yards and four touchdowns to become UConn's all-time leading receiver in those categories. He was honored as a third team All-American by the Associated Press and was a first team All-Conference performer.

Opposite Didio is the very talented Alex Davis. The second team Yankee Conference, junior flanker caught 62 passes for 814 yards and nine TDs. Tight end Brian Kozlowski caught 51 passes, good for fifth in the conference in receptions. He too was a second team Conference pick.

If you're looking for an Achilles heel on offense, UConn is thin at tailback with the departures of Kevin Wesley (570 yds) and Victor Taylor (522 yds).

Defensively six starters return. . . But, in order for this team to win, it must score lots of points.

5. VILLANOVA: A quarterback controversy in Villanova is the big story. Brockton native Tom Colombo and sophomore Brad Parpan are competing for the right to start.

Colombo played in eight games last year (starting six), throwing for 1,128 yards and five touchdowns, completing 92-of-168 passes. Parpan replaced Colombo at halftime of the Delaware game, exactly midway through the season and went on to start the final five games. He completed 71-of-141 passes for 758 yards and five TDs.

"I think it's just a matter of who we're gonna open up with," said coach Andy Talley. "If things aren't progressing well we can always put the other guy in, I plan on playing both players anyway." A bad situation for both the team and the players.

The versatile Pat Kennedy, a senior tailback led the team in rushing last year compiling 791 yards on the ground and catching 40 passes for 415 yards.

"We're really loaded at tailback this year," Talley said. "Pat is being pushed by Kevin Mosley and Vernon Smith, two fine backs."

All-Yankee Conference inside linebacker Curtis Eller returns as the team's leading tackler (87) for the second season in a row. He spearheads a young defense which should continue to improve as the season progresses.

"We only have five seniors on the team and we return 17 starters, so I am optimistic that we can have a very good year," Talley said.

Villanova's first three games are on the road, a tough place to open up, Talley said. Two are conference games against Maine and Richmond, thought to be the two weakest teams in the conference. Should they survive those two games (which they should), by the time they meet the elite of the conference, their quarterback controversy should be resolved and they should have two conference victories under their belt. Talley feels that if the team can win at Maine and Richmond they will have a definite say as to who wins the title.

6. BOSTON UNIVERSITY: Dan Allen enters his second year as head coach at BU. In his inaugural season, the Terriers (5-6 overall, 4-4 in the YanCon) came within one win of enjoying their first winning season since 1984 when they finished 9-3, 4-1 and tied for first with Rhode Island.

Whether the Terriers snap their six year drought remains to be seen, but critics seem to feel that this team lacks offensive fire power and quality defensive players to succeed in the Yankee Conference.

Stan Greene, the Co-Offensive Player of the Year in the Yankee Conference last year graduated and his shoes will not be filled. Greene threw for 3,135 yards and 17 TDs a year ago. Maybe more important is that he ran the Run-and-Shoot to near perfection, making everyone around him a better player, according to Allen. Left to replace Greene is senior Mark Haering, sophomore Greg Moore or junior Walter Norton.

"I don't know if you ever replace a Stan Greene," Allen said. "These three quarterbacks don't have the type of game experience that you'd like to have. . . you don't ask them to do the type of things that Stan did."

Senior running back Jay Hillman will once again be the horse in the backfield. Hillman comes off his best year, when he rushed for 721 yards and nine touchdowns.

"Depth is a big concern to us," Allen said. "We can not have any major injuries especially to our key personnel. If we do, then it may be a long season."

7. RHODE ISLAND: The Rams can't help but feel a little snake bitten. They ended the 1990 campaign 5-6, 2-6 in the Yankee Conference. However, five of their six losses came by a touchdown or less, and a combined 24 points.

The Rams should only get better. They return 18 starters, 10 on offense. Quarterback Kevin Neville is gone and the untested Steve Holland takes over for coach Bob Griffin who returns to URI for his 16th season.

"I feel the need to win more because we haven't had a winner in five years," Griffin said.

Senior tailback John Newson is back after rushing for 890 yards and 11 touchdowns in 1990.

The loss of Kevin Smith in the secondary will hurt. All-Conference tackle John Klumbach (13 sacks) returns.

"We need to avoid injuries and get good production out of our new quarterback to be a factor in the race," Griffin said.

This may be the dark horse that each conference seems to have.

8. MAINE: The Bob Zurinskas era begins. The sophomore quarterback from Brockton is supposed to lead Maine back to the top. He has the respect of everyone in the Maine program, coach Kirk Ferentz is confident that he can succeed, opposing coaches are wary of him. Now, all he has to do is play up to expectations. And that won't be easy since people in Maine still remember the glory days that Maine's all-time leading passer Mike Buck provided.

"Bob has great leadership skills, he's a very emotional and fiery competitor and those things are hard to coach," Ferentz said. "We're very high on his future at our place."

After 1989 almost anything that Carl Smith did on the football field would be a bit of a letdown. In 1989, the senior All-Yankee tailback led the nation in rushing, gaining 1,680 yards and scoring 20 TDs. Last year, Smith had a bad season, that is bad for Carl Smith's standards. He only rushed for 794 yards. Enough said.

All-Yankee kicker Jeff Mottola 21-22 extra points and 13-18 field goals is also back.

9. RICHMOND: Poor Jim Marshall. At media day, he sat alone while Bill Bowes and Jim Reid were swamped with reporters.

The Spiders return 17 starters which would normally be fantastic except that they were 1-10 last year. Richmond was outscored 312-133 last year. The defense allowed 4,570 yards, that's 415.5 yards per game, while the offense was held to 232 yards per game, a far cry from New Hampshire's 430.

If you're looking for a bright spot, linebacker Eric Johnson recorded 173 tackles last year, 91 of which were unassisted.

Emblems are in the order the teams were predicted to finish.

Water polo hoping to form the right chemistry this year

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The graduation of six seniors from last year's water polo team has coach Russ Yarworth smiling.

"It was time for them to go," Yarworth said. "The team chemistry was not moving in a productive direction."

Yarworth was not happy to see Jon Miller graduate. Miller had 76 goals and 32 assists last year. "He was a bum," joked Yarworth. "You don't replace Jon Miller, he did it all for us."

Miller assumes a new role as he joins Yarworth on the deck as an assistant coach.

The 1991 version of water polo is young, yet experienced. There are only four seniors on the team, however there are seven juniors, forming a strong nucleus. The goals as always are to win the New England Championships, which would mean upsetting Brown which hasn't lost since Jimmy Carter was president, qualify for the Eastern Championships and go to the Nationals.

"Whether we can reach it or not? I think we are one of the teams in the running," Yarworth said. "There's a lot of parity in the East this year."

The first tournament at Army on Sept. 7 has UMass seeded fourth. Slippery Rock is first, followed by Navy, Brown, Harvard fifth, Iona, Princeton, Bucknell, Richmond and Army.

Second team All-East goalie Todd Larson is back. He kept UMass in several games last season and saved almost 50 percent of the shots fired at him. He is not a tremendous athlete, but he is very smart, according to Yarworth.

"He makes the most of his athletic talent and therefore, becomes a better goalie because of the way he plays the position," Yarworth said. He also felt that Larson should have been honored as the first team All-East goalie.

Alex Yelensky, a 6-2, 210 pound senior and Tasan Engin (6-foot-6, 240) will step in at the two-meter spot, a.k.a., The hole that Miller left. Yelensky netted 38 goals last season and Engin had 18.

"If you can't control two-meters, then you can't be successful," Yarworth said. "I think Engin and Yelensky are going to be two of the premier players in the East."

The depth of this team is its field players (drivers). Senior Adam Feldman's left arm should prove invaluable to UMass. He is the team's only experienced lefty, something that Yarworth says is vital to a team's success.

Scott Deluca is back after redshirting last year because of a knee injury and Yarworth is expecting big things from him.

Junior Scott Reed is being billed the next Jon Miller. A tough billing to live up to.

"I don't think he can fill Jon's shoes right away, but he'll make a big step towards it," Yarworth said.

The freshman class looks as if it can step in right away and contribute. Javier Gonzalez is participating in the Junior World Championships representing Puerto Rico. He won't be with the team until Sept. 7, but when he does finally arrive, he will start.

Adolfo Oliete from Spain hasn't played a lot in the past year and will have to get in shape. However, Yarworth feels that in a solid program in which he plays everyday, he has the ability to be an impact player. Look for Rich Schragger and Luke Harlan to get valuable playing time.

"I'm willing to lose a few games at the beginning of the year to get these freshman experience," Yarworth said. "We can go a long way, it's gonna be tough. . . the kids are excited."

Being a Sox fan is never easy

No one ever said that being a Boston Red Sox fan was easy.

This season has been proof positive of how hard it is to be a BoSox fan. If you don't agree, it can only be for two reasons. One would be that you've been under a rock since 1918. The other would be that you're one of those bandwagon Oakland Athletics fans who ran out and bought an A's hat when they won the 1989 World Series. If that's the case, all I can say is "Let's go Twins!"

Boston fans don't know whether they should laugh or cry at this soap opera - vaudeville comedy - horror movie of a season. The laughter you hear is because the Sox are still in a pennant race despite playing .500 ball all year. The tears are due to the fact that this is a team which should be waxing the floor with the rest of the A.L. East, yet for some reason continues to underachieve.

I mean, really. Besides Toronto, the A.L. East is a pathetic division. Detroit deserves credit for staying in the race, but most of the credit goes to manager Sparky Anderson. Without him the Tigers would be a very average team. Cleveland? Don't make me laugh. Baltimore and Milwaukee? Both fell out of the race too early. The Yankees? They're still too young. That leaves Boston and Toronto - the only teams with any business in first place in the A.L. East.

What really beguiles me is that the Blue Jays are the only division team the Sox have beat consistently all season. Frankly, they could use the wins.

Even with all their problems, hope springs eternal in Fenway Park. The Sox had just moved to within three and a half games of first place when this was written, and were about to embark on a West coast swing. Boston traditionally has problems with road trips out west, but I won't venture a guess given the unpredictability of this bunch. They could be in first or fourth by the time you read this.

Why, oh, why did it take this long for the Sox to wake up from their season-long nap and challenge for the division lead? If I explained every theory I've heard on the subject, this column would look more like the Encyclopedia Britannica. Here, then, are but a few of those "things that make you go hmmmm" about the '91 Red Sox.

Who framed Roger Rabbit?: Sports Illustrated did. Just when the Rocket was cruising along with a 6-0 record in May, SI decided to pull the rug out from under him.

Greg Sukiennik

Did they slander him? Did they make fun of him? No, they did something far worse. They put him on the cover, thereby cursing him for the rest of the 1991 season.

Soon after that issue of Sports Illustrated hit the newsstands, Clemens' season started to slip. He had a couple of really atrocious outings. He suffered from slow starts in games, unable to get on track until the third inning. He wound up with no decisions when he should have had wins (thank you, Jeff Reardon). The state even took his gun away.

Is Clemens slowing down? Is the pressure of being so highly-paid, of being counted on as the savior, too much for even a pitcher of Clemens' stature? Stay tuned.

The Marshall Plan: step one — sign overrated first baseman/outfielder whose biggest claim to fame was a relationship with Belinda Carlisle. Step two — sign three of four better players to play in place of him. Step three — let him whine on the bench all season long, wasting a valuable roster spot and making life miserable.

Lou Gorman and Joe Morgan both have a fair amount of baseball smarts, but you'd never know it the way they mishandled Mike Marshall. Poor Mikey, damned to a life of sitting on the bench for a million dollars a year. Pity the players and fans who put up with this episode for months on end didn't get a share of his million. When no teams showed interest in Marshall, Gorman should have done right away what he waited months to do - waive him unconditionally.

Jack be quick: Jack Clark is prone to long slumps. This is not classified information - anyone who followed him on the Padres or the Yankees knows this to be true.

Why did Gorman shell out so much dough for such a Jekyll and Hyde performer? Clark struck out looking so many times, his name should be spelled with backwards Ks. It's hard to complain now that Clark has come alive with his bat, but timely hitting on his part earlier in the season might have had the Sox in first all year long.

With a month left, the Sox' chances are excellent if they keep at it. The hitting has come around and their fielding is once again solid. Pitching remains the key, however. Boston needs a resurgence from Clemens, as well as some late-season heroics from Danny Darwin and Matt Young. Greg Harris and Joe Hesketh have been nothing short of remarkable - continued success from them is another key.

One final note - here's a salute to Jeff Gray, still recovering from a yet-to-be-explained collapse in the clubhouse. Gray was the Sox one constant all season long, and his presence in the pen is severely missed. Get well soon, man.

Field hockey searching for offense

Team loses most of last season's scorers to graduation

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Pam Hixon; owner of 201 career wins (the most of any active coach at UMass), and last year's Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year is back for another field hockey season. She lost 26 of her team's 43 goals to graduation and is left with only seven players who scored at least one goal last year.

Gone is Mara Frattasio (11 goals) a first team All-Atlantic 10 selection, Kerri Fagan (seven) a second team All-A-10 player and captains Beth Thornton (four) and Lisa Berardinelli. They will all be missed.

The loss of Fagan has caused Hixon to change her defensive alignment. She has decided to play without a sweeper since they "don't have a pure one yet." For the time being they will line up with two players in the backfield. Hixon believes that it won't be long before one of the freshman develop into a natural sweeper.

"The core of freshman athletes is very good," Hixon said. "We are looking at a number of them to step in and be our sweeper."

But defense is not this team's problem. Junior goalie Philippa Scott is back and that is comforting. She is irrefutably one of the top goalies in the country. She started all 22 games for UMass last year, despite being plagued by chronic knee problems. She ran off shutout strings of four and five games en route to a 0.78 goals against average and 14 blankings of the opposition. She is the one player who can carry this team on her back, something not easy to do considering she can't score a goal. And she's healthy. And. . . Her backup, Tina Rusiecki participated in the Olympic Developmental Program this past summer.

"We're very happy with both of our goalies," Hixon said. However, Hixon does not like to rotate goalies. She feels that it is unsettling to the defense when goalies are constantly being platooned. It looks like Rusiecki may once again be spending a lot of time on the bench.

"Our returning core of players is very strong," Hixon said. "The kids who are returning are better this year than they were last year."

Back is second team All-Conference forward, senior Dawn Trumbauer. She netted seven goals and had six assists a year ago, a total she should surpass this season.

Senior midfielder Sherlan Cabralis has the ability to control the pace of a game. She seems to always be around the ball, Hixon said. Cabralis only scored once last year and Hixon is looking for a little more offense out of her.

Sophomores Jenn Salisbury and Tara Jelley are expected to provide the team with some much needed scoring punch. Salisbury had five goals last year, while Jelley spent most of her time watching from the sideline.

"I see Jenn and Tara being around the net and getting a lot of good scoring opportunities," Hixon said.

Last year's team failed to capitalize on its penalty corners on a regular basis. When they played teams like defending champion Old Dominion who thrived on the penalty corner, they saw how powerful a weapon it can be.

"I think one of the keys is to develop a good corner," Hixon said. "We need to be more dangerous."

Defensively, senior Joy Blenis, junior Kathy Phelan and sophomore Tracy Barclay are sound and should get even better as the season progresses.

This year's team will open the season ranked in the top 20, according to Hixon. Their ranking will be tested early as they open up against Northwestern, one of the top four teams in the nation last year.

"You look at the schedule and you see some heavy hitters," Hixon said. Of the 19 games UMass plays, 13 are against teams that were ranked in the top 20 at one point during the 1990 season. "Every year is tough," she said. "I know it sounds boring, but just as always you have to take each day as it comes."

In their final two games of 1990, the Minutemen (8-2-1) were outscored 74-16. The Yankee Conference champions were trounced 38-0 by William and Mary in the first round of the Division I-AA playoffs (their worst defeat since Dick MacPherson's 1974 team lost 70-8 to Boston College) and the week before they surrendered 36 points to New Hampshire and lost by 18.

The problems that existed then still exist and there are some new concerns. First and second (this problem is so big, that it deserves to be two problems), they do not know who the starting quarterback is. Third, the offensive line has some gaping holes to fill.

"Right now it's like pieces of a puzzle," said Reid, last year's Yankee Conference Coach of the Year. "We're still trying to get the shape and the outline of it."

The four suspects to quarterback the offense are: Paul Tornatore, Tom Fasano, Dave McGovern and Tony Williams.

Williams is the most intriguing of the four. He redshirted as a freshman, then was asked to move from cornerback to quarterback because of the injuries to Wilkos, Fasano and McGovern.

"I went to Staten Island a few times this summer and Gary [Wilkos] helped me with the plays," Williams said. 'He told me that "It's your position to get taken away from you."

"He's probably the best athlete out here," McGovern said of Williams.

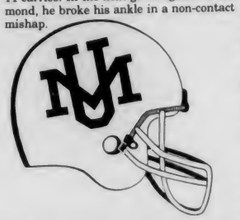
McGovern (40-75, 525 yards and four TDs) started the last three games of the season and may have been the starting quarterback going into this season if he had not missed spring camp. However, he injured his knee in the William and Mary game and underwent surgery last winter.

"He's got great quarterback skills... he's probably the guy that could do everything we want," Reid said.

McGovern said, "I'm pretty average at everything. There's no quarterback controversy, we're all friends."

Tornatore has the best arm of the four. However, UMass has traditionally been a running team, so don't expect him to start.

Fasano was the backup to Wilkos. In his first start against Northeastern, he was 7-12 for 57 yards, a TD and gained 44 yards on 11 carries. In the next game against Richmond, he broke his ankle in a non-contact mishap.



"I think what's gonna determine who plays, may not be so much what they do, but who we have surrounding them," Reid said.

There is also a running back controversy. But this is one of those can't-make-a-bad-choice situations. Last year's Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Year and second team All-Conference All-Star John Johnson rushed for 729 yards and six touchdowns. But he is not the starter.

Jerome Bledsoe is. When healthy, he is among the most exciting players to watch in the Yankee Conference. However, staying healthy is one thing Bledsoe has been unable to do at UMass. In 1989 he missed five games with knee and thigh injuries and last season he broke his ankle in the first game of the year and missed the next 10 games.

"I really want to see Jerome have a good year," Johnson said. "When he's healthy, he's awesome."

"To me, there is no controversy," Reid said. "Jerome has been here for five years, he's done some incredible things... as long as he's healthy he'll play."

The Minutemen are thin at fullback. Duncan McRae, Mike George and Jeremy Coffey may all see time.

In their search to find a big play receiver, sophomore Eric Thimas has moved from the backfield to flanker. The 5-5, 150 pound sophomore rushed for 425 yards last year and caught nine passes.

Lamar Newsome is the only returning starter at wide receiver. He caught 24 passes for 361 yards a year ago.

First team All-Conference and All-ECAC tight end Ron Villone caught 21 passes last year. He is an outstanding blocker with a great pair of hands, Reid said.

The once-great offensive line was decimated due to natural causes. Graduation took center Jay Gabbe, a first team All-Conference selection, Paul Mayberry, who was named to three different All-American teams, Anthony Giudice, a first team All-Yankee pick and Al Pogarian. These losses leave huge holes to be filled.

The news is not all bad. First team All-Conference tackles Rich Cavanaugh and Kai Dietiker are back. Although Cavanaugh has been playing with an injured shoulder, Reid is relatively certain that he will be ready for the opener.

"We need Rich and Kai, they're bookends," said Offensive Coordinator Doug Berry.

Phil Hallard, who was a starter in 1989, but missed the 1990 season with a knee injury, will occupy one guard spot. Reid said he has been playing well in practice and is pleased with his comeback.

Andy LeBlanc, a redshirt freshman and Bill Durkin, who last year played tight end and defensive line, are competing for the center spot. Durkin is an exceptional athlete and Reid is optimistic that he will make the transition from defensive to offensive line without any problem. If Durkin does start at center, LeBlanc could move to the open guard spot.

Any injuries to the offensive line could prove costly.

The good news is that the defense which ranked second in the country a year ago (256.7 yards per game), third in rushing (82.6) and fifth in scoring (13.7) returns 10 starters (nine now that safety Matt Rajotte has been lost for the year with a back injury).

Up front, senior Rich Kane is the King. Kane had eight sacks last year among his 49 tackles. He was named first team All-Conference, first team All-ECAC and first team All-New England. John Creamer and Jim Mancaruso also return.

You can't talk about linebackers without mentioning All-American candidate Mario Perry. The junior from Albany, New York is the total package — speed, size and strength. Perry started all 11 games for the Minutemen and was named first team All-Conference and second team All-ECAC.

Matt Tulley missed four games last year due to a shoulder injury but still registered 75 tackles and earned first team All-Conference honors. Bobby Burke (66 tackles) and Scott Assencoa (41 tackles) are the other returning starters. Greg Mattern, Tulley's replacement, proved he is capable of playing in the Yankee Conference when he recorded 13 tackles against UConn.

People are already talking about Vaughn Williams dominating games from the safety position just like Ronnie Lott does. The senior has started every game for three consecutive years (that is 34 straight). He was a second team All-Conference pick and is destined for the first team this season.

Allen Williams and Don Caparotti return as the starting cornerbacks, while Lance Neveling will fill Rajotte's shoes.

Syracuse transfer Jim Maguire will handle the kicking and Mike George should punt unless Maguire also proves to be the better punter.

Cullen makes change from offense to defense

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Every team would love to have an unstoppable, dominating defensive lineman such as UMass' Joe Cullen on their side of the field.

However, Cullen is no longer a player for the Minutemen.

But fortunately for UMass, he's still on their side as the new defensive line coach. Last year he was the running back coach, but when several coaches left UMass, Coach Jim Reid asked Cullen to take over the defensive line.

"[Coach Reid] wanted me to coach the defensive line," Cullen said. "Nobody in this world was more excited about that than I was."

When Joe Cullen played, he was a force to reckon with. He was a four-year starter at nose guard from 1986 to 1989, during which he played in every game — 45. He was a two-time All-New England selection and was the team's captain and Most Valuable Player in 1989.

A native of Quincy, he was a first team All-ECAC pick in 1988 and a three-time second team All-Yankee Conference selection. In addition, Cullen was honored by the National Strength and Conditioning Association in 1989 as an All-American.

"I'm going to try to instill in my players what I thought I tried to do when I played," Cullen said. "They're going to be tough, aggressive, hard-nosed and the leaders of the football team."

So far, it's been effective, maybe even too effective.

"The defensive linemen are killing us in practice," Reid said. "They're all just like Joe: intense, serious, hard-working and exact on their reads."

After Cullen's senior season, he expressed interest in staying involved with UMass football. Reid and defensive coordinator Mike Hodges made the decision to hire him as the running back coach.

"I felt like we needed a role model, an example, somebody the guys could really respect," Reid said.

"At first it was a little shaky," admitted Cullen. "I was a defensive lineman for years and now they wanted me to coach running backs."

The jitters soon disappeared as Cullen's corps ran off with the number one ranking in team rushing in the Yankee Conference and ninth in the nation. They were a group that lost its number one back, Jerome Bledsoe, in the first game of the season and had to rely on freshmen John Johnson and Eric Thimas for production.

"He was able to instill toughness and intensity in the young running backs," Reid said.

"I learned a lot about offense and I learned a lot more about defense as well," said Cullen of his first coaching experience.

"Since I've been here at UMass, this year's defensive line probably has the most depth," Cullen said. "They had a great spring and they've really worked hard. I've been telling them that you can't let anybody outwork you."

"Everything I've learned, I've learned from him," Mancaruso said.

Cullen admitted that there is still some fine-tuning that needs to be done, but believes that "if they just play hard, good things will happen."

Cullen speaks from experience, "Coaching the defensive line was my goal when I got into this profession. I couldn't be happier."

Six hoop recruits on board

Freshman Roe tops list with national honors

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Whether William Herndon is eligible to play basketball this season or not, there will be an exciting, powerful, stand-up-when-he's-going-in-for-a-slam dunker on the court when UMass begins practicing in October. Freshman Louis Roe, breaker of three backboards in high school is here and ready to play ball.

This past summer Roe was named the Naismith New Jersey Player-of-the-Year by the Atlanta Tipoff Club. He competed in the Hank Gathers College League in Philadelphia and was awarded Player-of-the-Week honors. The league included Atlantic 10 players Mik Kilgore, James Spears and Mark Strickland from Temple, as well as St. Joseph's Rap Curry and last year's A-10 Freshman of the Year Bernard Blunt.

Roe brings to UMass an impressive list of honors that includes being named All-State by USA Today, a Street and Smith's top 40 high school player in the country and a McDonald's Capital Classic All-American. The 6-foot-7, 210 pound Roe averaged 26.1 points and 15 rebounds per game this past season at Atlantic City High School in New Jersey.

"He definitely is an impact player," said Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "I wouldn't expect him to start, but he definitely will play."

Roe was also recruited by Syracuse, Florida State and Clemson.

Add to the list of recruits who will be suiting up for the Minutemen Scott Drapeau, Ted Cottrell, Derek Kellogg, Jerome Malloy and Michael Williams.

Mr. Basketball in New Hampshire, Drapeau averaged 21 points and 19 rebounds per game last season. He was the USA Today/Gatorade Player of the Year in New Hampshire and participated in the Nike All-American Camp.

"Scott is a big strong kid with good passing and rebounding skills," Flint said. "Last year one of our biggest problems was rebounding, so Scott and Lou should really help us there."

Williams was once a top 60 recruit coming out of high school. He averaged 28 points and 7.6 assists per game last year. He should add depth at the guard spot.

Malloy was a big time scorer at Kennedy High School in Waterbury, Conn. The 6-4 forward/guard averaged 28.5 points and 13 boards per game. He will be playing behind UMass' leading scorer, Jim McCoy (18.9 ppg), so his playing time may be limited.

He was also recruited by North Carolina State and Duquesne but fell in love with UMass when he visited.

"He'll get a year to mature," Flint said. "I think he needs to get a little stronger in order to help us out."

Springfield native Derek Kellogg did not receive the publicity he rightfully deserved, but that's bound to happen when you play in the same city as Travis Best, one of the top five players in the country last year.

At Cathedral High School, the 6-3 guard averaged 24.7 points and 7.3 rebounds in his senior year. He's a sound defender and a good ball handler, according to Flint.

Cottrell is another big body (6-9, 210 pounds) who can run the floor, rebound and block shots. "He is somewhat of a project," Flint said. "He's more advanced than (7-foot-2 backup center) Jeff Meyer. His biggest weakness is that he's not strong."

Other basketball news from the summer... The Minutemen announced their non-conference schedule. UMass opens its 1991-92 campaign at home with a midnight game which will be broadcast live on ESPN. The game will either be November 22 or 23 against Siena, a team UMass beat in the NIT last year. Keep in mind that on November 23, UMass football hosts New Hampshire in what many are projecting to be the game which decides the Yankee Conference.

The Minutemen will be on ESPN at least one more time, when they host the University of Oklahoma and Billy Tubbs at the Springfield Civic Center on Jan. 4 at 8 p.m.

"Oklahoma was really set up by ESPN," Flint said. "They wanted us because of the excitement and fan support that we showcased with that midnight game."

If you're wondering why the game is in Springfield, the reason is that Oklahoma would not agree to play a game in the Cage. The Minutemen will play in Norman, Oklahoma next season.

"We play a lot of good teams early and that should help us down the road," Flint said. "We want to go to the NCAA Tournament, that's our goal... With our schedule we'll be prepared to play against the best."

During Thanksgiving recess, the Minutemen will be in Anchorage for the Great Alaskan Shootout (a tournament annually broadcast on ESPN). Teams in the Shootout who competed in the NCAA Tournament last season are Coastal Carolina (26-8), Eastern Michigan (26-7) and New Orleans (23-8). Rounding out the field are Idaho (19-11), Santa Clara (16-13), Oregon State (14-14) and the host school, Division II Alaska-Anchorage (19-11).

The Minutemen have drawn what appears to be a favorable bracket. They play Santa Clara in the opening round and if they win, they play the winner of the Oregon State-Alaska-Anchorage game. The championship game will be played on Monday at 8 p.m. Alaska time, which is Tuesday, Dec. 3, at midnight eastern time.

On the way back from Alaska, the Minutemen make a pit stop in Lexington, Kentucky to do battle with the Wildcats and Rick Pitino. Kentucky was 22-6 last season but was ineligible for postseason play.

On Dec. 7, Xavier (22-10), which lost to UConn in the second round of the NCAAs, visits the Cage. The Minutemen will host New Hampshire on Dec. 10 and travel to Holy Cross on Dec. 12.

They resume play on Dec. 27 and 28 when they host the second annual Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic at the Springfield Civic Center. Iowa State, Fairfield and Harvard round out the four team field.

The Minutemen also meet Boston University and take on their usual Atlantic 10 foes.

Men's soccer can only gain

Program dropped, but back for final season

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team has nothing to lose.

The program was cut from the athletic budget last spring after a dismal 3-11-3 fall season (1-5-2 in the Atlantic 10). In addition, they lost their head coach of eight years, Jeff Gettler.

However, even before the start of this season, the Minutemen have made some considerable gains.

The program was able to accumulate enough outside funding to compete for one more season. They are returning six talented starters from last year's team and were able to acquire a top Division I soccer coach, Sam Koch (see accompanying story).

With a new team, Koch said his first project will be to develop a system that best suits his players.

He described his squad at Stanford University, where he was head coach for six years before coming to UMass, as a blue-collar, short-passing team that attacked out of the back with a high-pressure defense.

As for his plans for the Minutemen, Koch said, "I have my ideas but I don't know yet. We won't really know what we can do until we play someone else.

"I think it will be a new look," he said.

Returning for the Minutemen will be last season's third leading scorer and captain Dan Lawrence. Lawrence, an All-American candidate, started 15 games last season and tied for the team lead in goals with four.

Last season's freshman sensation Randy Jacobs will also be back. Jacobs, who started in only nine games, led the team in points with 12 (four goals, four assists), scoring three goals in the final game of the season against Fairfield. Seniors Ray Cunha (two, three, seven points) and Brett Anthony (three, two, eight points) should ignite the offense.

Defensive specialists Darren Stone and Matt Bearce return to finish their college careers along with sophomore Todd Kylish. Last year's defense allowed 274 shots on goal, 34 more than UMass took.

Saving 65 of those shots was Jon Gruber, who is back to defend the nets. The senior started 10 games last season allowing 18 goals. He tallied a 1.68 goals against average. Gruber will be competing for the starting job with freshman Mark Wolf and

Ko(a)ch brings experience

Former Stanford coach is a proven winner

By BRETT MORRIS

Simply introducing Sam Koch as the new men's soccer coach at the University of Massachusetts is not enough. Looking at his coaching and playing credentials, rolling out a red carpet would be more appropriate.

Koch compiled a 58-53-16 record for a winning percentage of .520 in his six years of coaching at Stanford University. During his time at the helm, Stanford was ranked in the top 20 for two brief stints. He said his team was in the running for NCAA postseason play two years, but fell short of getting a bid.

Last season, Stanford extended eventual National Champion Virginia and 10th ranked UCLA to overtime before losing. And they lost to third ranked Indiana by one deflected goal. The Cardinal defeated number nine SMU and number 16 Old Dominion, both on the road.

In 1987, Stanford had a four game stretch where they beat three teams in the top 20: Fresno State, UCLA and the University of South Florida, former national champions. After tying the eventual national champions, Indiana State, in 1988, the Cardinal received their highest ranking ever, 12th.

Koch was named the Pacific Soccer Conference Coach of the Year in 1987. He has been a Western Regional Olympic Development Staff coach since 1985 and is also an assistant coach for the 14 and under Western Regional Team.

A former midfielder at Colby College, Koch began his coaching career in 1979 as an assistant at Brown University. After four years there, Koch became an assistant at Boston College for one season.

He was a soccer instructor at the United States Soccer School, the Boston College Soccer School, the California Youth Soccer Association camp and the Brown University Soccer School.

An instructor for the Massachusetts Youth Soccer Association, Koch obtained his "A' license from the USSF Coaching School in 1983. He obtained a Level IV Canadian Coaching License, the highest level license in Canada.

After last season, Koch, a native of Concord, decided to return home to his family and continue his master's work in sports studies both at UMass and the University of Connecticut. Koch was the top recommendation to the Athletic Department by outgoing head coach Jeff Gettler.

"I'm really excited and elated he re-newcomer Jonathan Roche. Steve Armenti, who shared the goalteuding duties with Gruber last season, transferred to Seton Hall.

Last season's promising freshman, Aaron Zandy, transferred to St. Bonaventure.

Seven new players will be suiting up for the Minutemen, increasing the likelihood that the team will have a new look. Included are notable transfers Shawn Bleau from Brandeis and Joshua Pittman from Michigan.

"We definitely have a couple of transfers and freshmen who will be contributors," Koch said.

As a new coach, he said he will treat all of the players as "rookies fighting for new positions."

In addition to adjusting to a new team, Koch will be preparing game plans for a tough schedule. The Minutemen begin their season on the road Saturday against Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure and will face stiff competition down the road from Temple, Vermont, Dartmouth and Rutgers.

"When you only won three games the year before, I'd be very upset if anyone thought there was an easy game," Koch said.

Koch will have the services of two assistant coaches: Rick Caldwell, and John Guppy, a former All-American. Caldwell, an assistant under Koch at Stanford, will be working with the goalies.

"My goal is to have the team play an exciting brand of soccer, work hard and show that UMass can play with the best," Koch said.

ceived the position," said Gettler who is now the head coach at Lafayette College. "I feel he will do a tremendous job and the team will have a great year."

"Even though my job is done at the end of the season, I care about the program," Koch said. "I want the program to succeed."

As a direct result of the budget cuts, the men's soccer program was originally cut from the Athletic Department's budget. However, after a fundraising effort, the program was reinstated for a final season.

"I think the kids have a lot to prove this year, but the main thing is to have fun," Koch said. "If you don't have fun, it's kind of a waste to be out there.

"I will enjoy doing everything and anything I can to help them do it."

Three UMass baseball players selected in draft

Brian Bright once a UMass outfielder is hoping to some day swing his bat in Fenway Park for the Red Sox. Bright is currently playing for the Elmira Pioneers.

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Brian Bright, Glenn DiSarcina and Derek Dana can now list their occupation as Professional Baseball Player.

In the first week of June, the three former University of Massachusetts baseball players were selected in the amateur baseball draft. Bright was the Boston Red Sox' 22nd round selection. The Chicago White Sox picked DiSarcina in the 14th round. And Dana was taken by the San Francisco Giants in the 28th round.

Each signed a standardized minor league contract which expires at the end of the season. DiSarcina and Dana weren't permitted to disclose their exact salaries, but did say they will receive a full year's college tuition as part of their contracts. Bright would not disclose any terms of his contract, but said he was "satisfied" with the terms.

Bright is currently playing in New York for the Elmira Pioneers of the New York-Penn League. At press time, the outfielder was batting .234 for the Pioneers with four home runs and 16 RBIs.

The Revere native had a team high 10 home runs, 43 runs batted in, 16 doubles and .586 slugging percentage for the Minutemen last season. The tri-captain was a second team All-New England selection and had 28 career home runs in three years, just four shy of Drew Comeau's school record.

DiSarcina plays in the same league as Bright for the Utica Blue Sox. The Billerica native is hitting .245 with 38 hits, 21 RBIs and 10 stolen bases.

DiSarcina finished the 1991 season with a .317 batting average, led the Minutemen in hits with 60 and had 11 stolen bases in as many attempts. The DiSarcina name isn't new to professional baseball. Both his uncle Joe, a 1969 UMass graduate, and brother Gary, a 1988 grad, have played in the minor leagues. Gary is currently playing for the California Angels Triple A team.

Dana has been utilized as both a catcher and a designated hitter for the Everett Giants of the Northwest League. At press time he was hitting .304 with 31 hits, 11 doubles and one home run.

Dana was UMass' Most Valuable Player last season. The catcher from Lynn was a second team All-New England selection and a tri-captain. His .333 batting average led the team and his .564 slugging percentage was second. Dana was a solid defensive catcher, leading the team with a .954 fielding percentage.

At the conclusion of the season, each player will be given the option to play in their parent club's Instructional League throughout the winter and have their talent evaluated in spring training. They will then either be offered a contract to play for the same minor league team, to play for a different team at a higher level or no contract at all.

The players are presently at the Single A minor league level, the first of three levels (Double A is next, followed by Triple A) and the most distant from the "show," the Major Leagues.

UMass coach Mike Stone shed some light on the future of the young prospects:

"It depends on how well they hit with the wooden bats and if they can make the adjustment to seeing good pitching every day," he said. "Once you get to Double A, that's where you find out if they can cut the mustard.

"I think the biggest thing that separates the minor leaguers from major leaguers is consistency, that's the toughest aspect to deal with," Stone said.

Whatever happens, the players admit they are going through an experience they'll never forget. An experience which also includes restless hours of travel and constant practice.

"The competition is a little better but not something I can't handle," Bright said. "One guy is just as good or a little better than the next. I kind of expected a little more. I figured it would be a lot tougher."

Stone, who played professional baseball, said, "A lot of guys think that pro baseball is so glamorous and at a much higher level than college baseball."

"It's not really what it's built up to be," Bright said.

On the whole, the players seem to be pleased with their new jobs.

"Right now they just want us down here to play, have fun and enjoy the game," said an exhausted Bright, just back from playing in Canada. "They allow us to concentrate on just one thing, playing baseball."

"I enjoy just coming to the ballpark every day and playing every night," DiSarcina said.

All three would have been entering their senior years this fall as sport management majors. Bright and DiSarcina said they plan on finishing their studies at UMass sometime in the future, either when their schedule allows or when their stints as professional baseball players comes to an end.

Herndon's eligibility undetermined

Forward's future at UMass to be decided in October

By TAMIR LIPTON

William Herndon may not be soaring through the air for the Minutemen any more. He is currently ineligible and is awaiting a response to his appeal.

University of Massachusetts basketball forward William Herndon's eligibility for the upcoming season remains in question because of complex rules regarding the transfer of college athletes from one school to another.

Here is the problem in a nutshell: The NCAA has a rule which states that if a player transfers schools, he must sit out one academic year (two semesters), which Herndon did. No problem so far.

Here's where it gets confusing. The National Letter of Intent Committee, an organization separate from, but recognized by the NCAA, has its own rule which states that if a player transfers between semesters (which Herndon did), he must sit out an additional year. In other words, Herndon must sit out a total of two years (four semesters), which seems quite clear.

Under the guidance of Athletic Director Frank McInerney and Assistant Athletic Director Elaine Sortino, an appeal was filed with the Steering Committee, a function of the National Collegiate Commissioners. The thrust of the appeal claims that Herndon did not understand that he would have to sit out two years.

"Herndon wasn't appropriately oriented to the real situation," McInerney said. "He didn't know how long he would have to sit out."

The committee will hear the appeal on October 2 at the annual Commissioner's Conference in Chicago. If the Steering Committee turns down the appeal, then another appeal will be filed and heard the following day by the 37 Conference Commissioners, which will act as a sort of college basketball Supreme Court. McInerney said a ruling would be made within two days after the appeal is heard.

"When Coach [John] Calipari learned that he [Herndon] would have to sit out an additional year, he asked me to try and get him back to Richmond," McInerney said. "By that time, Richmond was three weeks into their semester and would not accept him back."

"Richmond started classes in early January and we started in late January because of intersession, so we missed it by a couple of weeks," Sortino said.

While at Richmond, Herndon appeared in seven games for the Spiders, averaging 1.5 points and 0.9 rebounds in just 6.4 minutes per game.

He was originally recruited by St. John's, UMass and Pittsburgh before enrolling at Richmond. The recruiting coordinator from Pittsburgh was a man by the name of John Calipari. The same John Calipari became the head coach at UMass in 1988 and in the spring semester of 1989, Herndon came to Amherst.

Women's hoop coach hopes to revamp team

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The women's basketball team has a new coach. The same team that went 0-27 last year. The same team which lost a few games by more than 50 points. And the same team that was the laughing stock of this campus last year.

Those were the bad days. The good days are about to begin, now that savior Joanie O'Brien is here and Kathy Hewelt is gone.

"I came here because I was at a point in my career that I was ready to take a step up," she said.

To say Joanie O'Brien comes to Amherst with an easy job, is kind of like saying William Weld has an easy job restoring the economy in Massachusetts. Not only must she convince her players that they can win, she must convince everyone else.

"With the kids that are coming back, I think that a lot of the losing has to do with attitude," O'Brien said. "We'll just try and change the attitude. You have to be positive with yourself and positive with the people that you're around in order to have a positive situation."

O'Brien comes to UMass from Auburn University where she spent five years as an assistant coach. During her five seasons, the Lady Tigers compiled a 149-20 record and went to the final four three years in a row, losing each time in the championship game. The other two years, the team advanced to the quarterfinals before bowing out.

"I never had the chance to wear that gold ring, but it's something that you work towards and that's why I'm in this business," O'Brien said.

She was a player at Penn State for four years before she went to Auburn. She averaged a career high 9.3 points per game during her junior year.

O'Brien is one of the few people who can say that she has a trophy named after her. The trophy is awarded to the individual who does the most for the Penn State team on and off the court. It was originally called the Penn State-Great Alaskan Alumni Club award.

"A man who belonged to the club came to Washington, D.C. on business and he used to watch us play," O'Brien said. O'Brien got to know him quite well and after winning the award her senior year, the man asked her if the club could rename the award in her honor, and, of course, she accepted.

Since coming to UMass, the 6-3 Herndon has become a fan favorite, often electrifying the crowd with a powerful dunk, coming from nowhere to block a shot, or soaring up near the rafters for a rebound.

"William gives us so much versatility because he can cover just about anybody and he's tough to match up with on offense," said Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "It definitely hurts us that we don't know if he's coming back."

Herndon averaged 11.9 points and six rebounds per game last season. He also had a team-high 47 steals and was fifth in the Atlantic 10 in blocked shots with 1.5 per game.

If Herndon's illustrious two year career at UMass is over, the Minutemen "will be losing one of the better athletes in the country," Flint said.

"One of our strengths this year will be experience and his being in there as a starter will help our freshman develop even more because there won't be as much pressure on them to come in and produce," he said.

It is interesting to note that in the UMass Pre-Season Prospectus Herndon is listed as a "player lost" with an asterik next to his name — meaning his eligibility is pending.

Calipari could not be reached for comment.

Gorbachev Grants Baltic Independence

By DEBORAH SEWARD
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev agreed yesterday to grant independence to the Baltic republics, officials said, making them the first breakaway Soviet states to win such recognition from the Kremlin.

With Soviet central authority crumbling in the wake of last month's hard-line coup, Gorbachev will issue decrees formally freeing the Baltics, the officials said after meeting with the Soviet president.

The move came as the highest Soviet lawmaking body today debated how power should be divided as the union is transformed into a loose confederation of sovereign states. Two-thirds of the Soviet republics have declared themselves independent.

Under a blueprint Gorbachev and the leaders of 10 of the 15 republics are trying to push through the Congress of People's Deputies, most of the central government's power would be transferred to the republics.

Negotiations yesterday focused on who would wield the most power in the interim government that would be formed to manage the transition to a new union.

Gorbachev had been expected to raise the issue of Baltic independence at the Congress, but did not because it apparently did not have enough support.

The Baltics, which began their independence drive three years ago, have already won recognition from dozens of foreign governments, including the United States. Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia also have applied for United Nations membership, and Moscow has indicated it won't block the move.

Word of Gorbachev's agreement to grant Baltic independence came after he met with Baltic representatives from the Congress. He asked them to draft a declaration, said Algimantas Cekoulis, a former Lithuanian deputy who is attending the Congress.

The Soviet leader approved the general idea after he read their draft, Cekoulis said. Former Gorbachev aide

UMass Student Dies

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

An 18-year-old University of Massachusetts sophomore died August 25 at a Schenectady, N.Y. hospital from injuries suffered in a car accident on August 21.

Laurin Aycox, who was born and raised in up-state New York town, lived in Webster Residence Hall and performed in the play Black Women's Survival Kit last May.

Jo Ella Costello, a graduate student in the education department who played in Survival Kit with Aycox, praised her maturity and desire to learn.

"[Aycox] was very bright, very mature and very open-minded," Costello said. "She had an insatiable hunger and thirst for knowledge — she had that hungry look in her eye."

Costello pointed out that Aycox learned the lines of each of the other eight actresses in the play as an example of her commitment to learning.

"It was so tragic — I got the news a week ago from [Survival Kit] director Kym Moore," Costello said. "All she said was a few words: "Bad news — Laurin, car accident — dead."

Aycox portrayed the Yoruba goddess Oshun, a warrior who represents feminine beauty and strength, in Survival Kit. The play was an opportunity for black women to "become aware of our history," said Kym Moore.

"She was really young — very nervous as an actress," Moore said. "But she really dared to test herself and was very courageous."

"The reason I cast her as a goddess was because of her inner strength," Moore said. "She was very idealistic and warm — she had a lot of trouble dealing with violence and with the world."

Costello is composing a poem and a collage to remember Aycox.

"I feel she would want me to do this, that this is the least I could do for her," Costello said. "I feel her strength — she cared about me a lot."

"She really tried to get close to me," Costello said. "When I let her in, she was always a part of my life. We laughed so much. There were some bad times, but 10 times more good times."

Director Moore characterized Aycox as "kind of a hippie," who appreciated peace.

"She had a hard time playing a warrior," Moore said. "It was hard for her to play someone who was violent — she would always try to see what was good [in people]."

While at UMass, Aycox was a member of the environmental group Greenpeace and Amnesty International. She also belonged to the Lutheran Church of the Good Shepherd.

Moore said that Aycox had performed in some plays during high school and

UM Appeals Town Fine

Cuts Slow Movement Toward Recycling

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts appealed yesterday to the Amherst Board of Health to not fine the University for landfilling recyclable waste.

The University has implemented a comprehensive, campus-wide recycling program, but at this time is not able to collect all recyclable waste, according to R. Marc Fournier, recently appointed solid waste manager.

The University has been fined in the past for not complying with the now mandatory Amherst recycling regulations. When trash arrives at the Amherst landfill containing more than a certain percentage of recyclables, the school must pay a small fine.

Fournier said the University's "comprehensive, professional" recycling program is steadily expanding. Because of budgetary restrictions, he cannot expand the program as fast as he or the town would like, he said.

Progress is steady but slow, he said.

He pointed out two primary reasons why the University could not comply with town regulations.

Fournier said the University needs more equipment such as central dumpsters and specialized trucks to fully mobilize the program. Also budget cuts have hurt the slowly expanding recycling program.

The Board of Health decided to put their decision "on hold" and requested that Fournier provide the Board with a monthly progress report on the University recycling program. He said he would comply with the request.

The report will show the Town of Amherst what materials UMass has recycled and what percentage of the waste stream they represent. The desired effect of the reports is to display the University's continued progress in implementing a comprehensive recycling program.

Earthworm, an environmental research group, has discovered that half of all the trash UMass produces can be diverted to recycling. Fournier said he hopes the University will recycle 15 to 20 percent of trash in the coming fiscal year and is optimistic about increasing that percentage every year.

"UMass is a city," Fournier said, explaining that the large student body and varied buildings make recycling a highly complex but very rewarding venture, similar to the recycling programs in any major metropolis.

"But we really are making progress," Fournier said. In addition to saving the University considerable money, recycling saves valuable natural resources, saves energy and water and reduces pollution, he said.

Fournier explained to the Board that a year ago UMass was recycling small amounts of waste. Now, he said, the University has a much expanded recycling program.

Guthrie Wants Alice's House

GREAT BARRINGTON, Mass. (AP) — This time Arlo Guthrie is interested in Alice's former home and not her restaurant.

The folksinger appeared before Great Barrington selectmen Tuesday night seeking a zoning change that would allow him to move his office from his own home in the nearby town of Washington to the converted church where Alice Brock lived in the 1960s.

The home, now owned by Ronald Ginzel, is about a mile away from the eatery Brock ran in Stockbridge and Guthrie made famous in "Alice's Restaurant," a ballad of his Thanksgiving Day arrest for littering in 1965 that kept him out of the draft.

Selectmen did not issue an immediate decision.

Is 55 mph too slow on Mass Pike?

BOSTON (AP) — It soon may be legal to drive up to 65 mph on some portions of the Massachusetts Turnpike, after years of having to abide by 55 mph restrictions, state lawmakers said.

The senate gave initial approval Tuesday to a bill raising the speed limit from 55 mph to 65 mph on the turnpike from the New York border to the Westfield interchange, and from the Ludlow interchange to the Auburn interchange.

Sen. Robert Buell said the federally imposed 55-mph speed limit was designed to fight the energy crisis of the 1970s, which, he said, "is over."

"Everyone knows that the real speed limit on our highways is 65 mph," said Buell, R-Boxford. "The public wants this, and to try it at least on the pike is a good idea."

The measure's sponsor, Sen. Robert Wetmore, D-Barre, said the bill was a "pilot project on the Massachusetts Turnpike to see if 65 mph works out."

The Senate sent the bill to a third reading on a 29-2 vote.

Federal regulations prohibit states from imposing a 65-mph speed limit in communities with populations larger than 50,000, at the risk of losing federal highway funds.

Gov. William Weld has said he supports a 65-mph limit on the Turnpike. Lt. Gov. Paul Celluci said Weld, who was scheduled to return from a trade mission to Asia yesterday, will sign the bill.

However, not every legislator was in favor of the plan to raise the speed limit.

Sen. Edward Burke, D-Framingham, said that because many motorists drive over the speed limit, the bill would "effectively set the speed limit at 70 mph."

"We'd have more fatalities. We'd see higher gasoline consumption. There are undeniable public safety considerations here," Burke said. "If we're going to do this, we ought to provide more funding for the state police."

ADD-DROP Entering the add-drop abyss

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Add-drop day at the University remains one of the most frustrating and difficult days for students.

Yesterday was no exception as hordes of students trudged to their respective add-drop locations to adjust their schedules, many waking up before dawn to clinch a good spot in the lines to better the chances for adding the correct course.

According to figures from the Registrar's office, 2,987 full-time undergraduates this year were not scheduled for all the courses for which they pre-registered and received an underloaded schedule with fewer than 12 credits.

Slightly more than 13,000 students were dropped from full or cancelled classes, a decrease of 9 percent from fall 1990, the registrar reported.

At the political science line in Machmer, early-bird students began camping out in the halls at 3:30 a.m. for the designated add-drop time of 7:30 a.m. Several students commented that the line seemed surprisingly small this year while they reminisced about times when the pol-sci lines snaked around the buildings.

But only one hour before the deadline, only 40 people were waiting in line, a comparatively small number.

The atmosphere was one of helplessness and confusion

New Students Welcomed to UMass

By AHVA DAVIS
Collegian Staff

For the first time ever, there were two new student convocations held because of the enormous size of the class of 1995 — over 3,000 first-year students.

The opening fanfare was done by barrel-chested music professor Walter Chestnut, the campus herald. Chestnut played his welcoming tune, and was met with thunderous applause.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin spoke about the transition to college and how quickly things can change.

Incoming students have gone from "someone who will be going to UMass to someone who is going to UMass," said Vanin.

"What a difference a day makes," she said.

She also stressed the importance of having outside activities as well as classes.

"Students should supplement academics with co-curricular activities," said Vanin.

Vanin closed by telling the students about the activities going on this week as part of First Week festivities, and encouraged everyone to participate.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan also emphasized the importance of not limiting interests to just academics and that "the decisions you make during college will shape the rest of your life."

Newnan encouraged the incoming class to take advantage of the "wealth of opportunities" offered at the University of Massachusetts.

He said that "as freshmen you start off with a clean slate." He said there are no mistakes that will set a person back or prevent a person from not being able to get involved in outside activities.

Newnan also stressed that, "You only get out what you put in" in college, especially at UMass.

The keynote address was given by Edward Phinney, chairperson of the classics department, and the recipient of the Distinguished Teachers Award.

Phinney, who attended graduate school at the University, spoke about the significance of the 1995 class logo: "Reach for It." A professor for many years, he said in his experience opportunities at the University are endless.

"Everyone is reaching for wisdom, safety, security, a loved one, a job or simply happiness," said Phinney.

The cover drawing on the convocation program shows a person reaching for a star. He said the star represented the goals and dreams students may want to reach before they leave UMass and college.

"Everyone knows you don't jump for a star. You wish upon it," said Phinney.

Phinney concluded by encouraging students to accept and learn from the diverse population of students at UMass.

"Let's all reach for it, and not laugh at peculiarities," said Phinney.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien closed by saying that he wanted UMass to "provide an outstanding education matching any in the country."

The Minuteman Marching Band performed selections from the 1991 season including the Alma Mater and the fight song.

Men's Soccer Alive

Team to play final season in '91

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

On July 24 the athletic administration announced that, as a result of a cooperative financial effort between the friends of the sport of soccer, UMass alumni and the athletic department, the men's soccer team would be allowed to play its final schedule. The efforts raised $24,000 for the necessary fees to fund an entire season.

When the athletic department at UMass announced that they could no longer fund the men's soccer program, the team immediately decided they would attempt to raise the money themselves.

Brett Anthony, one of the fundraisers, said the first step the team took was to seek "political friends."

"Alumni, coaches and soccer organizations from all over the country wrote hundreds of letters, putting pressure on the athletic department," Anthony said.

The most concerned and influential parties contacted were those who were involved with seeking to bring the World Cup Soccer Tournament to Boston, he said.

"What kind of statement are we making in the state of Massachusetts when we're cutting a sport that's the fastest growing in America?" Anthony said.

However, the team was given a July 1 deadline to let the athletic department know whether or not they could raise the funds.

In need of immediate donations the team solicited their parents to put up the initial money for the program with the intention of paying them back.

Determined to repay their parents, the team went on a fundraising rampage.

They contacted their opposing teams and asked them for aid. Anthony said that all, except for two or three, of the teams supported their efforts and contributed money for referee fees and traveling expenses.

"None of the coaches wanted to see the program cut," said Anthony. "It makes a bad statement for the sport."

Weld Veto Overridden

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The Legislature handed Gov. William F. Weld a resounding defeat Wednesday, overriding a veto aimed at forcing state employees to pay a bigger percentage of their health insurance premiums.

Many Republicans, especially in the Senate where Weld stood his best chance of having the veto sustained, joined the Democratic majority in voting against the governor.

"The unfortunate consequence of this vote is that there'll be a significant reduction in benefits," Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci said.

When he received the 1991 fiscal year budget, Weld, a Republican, slashed the $415 million appropriation for the group health insurance to $39 million. He later approved another $45 million in spending to pay for it through the end of this month. The move was aimed at forcing the Legislature to revisit the issue of employee premium contributions.

At the $415 million level, Cellucci said, the plan is under-funded by $45 million unless state workers pay more of the premiums or accept benefit cuts.

State employees now pay 10 percent of their health insurance, but with the state picking up the other 90 percent.

Weld and Cellucci had wanted employees to pay 25 percent, but Cellucci had offered to compromise at 20 percent with some benefit cuts.

Cellucci and legislative leaders met Tuesday afternoon in an attempt to reach a compromise, but the meeting ended without agreement.

On Wednesday, Democratic legislative leaders decided to bring the veto to a vote.

Weld lost in the House 130-21 and in the Senate 31-0.

Three senators, Republican leader David Locke of Wellesley, Assistant GOP leader Edward Kirby of Whitman and Democrat Edward Burke of Framingham, were prepared to vote with Weld.

But once they saw the overwhelming vote, they paired their votes with absent senators who would have voted against Weld. That is a common practice in the Senate when the votes of paired senators would not affect the outcome.

Weld needed to win a two-thirds majority in both chambers for the veto to be sustained.

Student group petitions for quality education

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

An advocacy group is trying to give state students a stronger voice in fighting for more reasonable tuition and fee rates at state universities.

The State Student Association of Massachusetts has just recently filed with the attorney general's office two initiative petitions designed to give all students of Massachusetts public higher education a constitutional right to quality, affordable schooling.

The proposed amendments would apply to primary through public higher education. The Massachusetts House of Representatives and the State Senate must convene together in a constitutional convention in order to vote on the proposal.

One of the primary goals of the Boston-based SSAM is to "remind administrators and elected officials that public higher education should be affordable and accessible," said Joseph Langis, the executive director of SSAM. He is disturbed by the annual climb of student tuition and fees at public schools throughout the state.

Langis also said that Gov. William Weld "has been no friend of public higher education," referring to the state leader's across the board cuts of university budgets resulting in higher and higher price tags for attending a state university.

SSAM has recently filed legislation to prohibit tuition and fees from exceeding the inflation rate and to increase scholarship aid proportionally with rising tuition and fees. Langis notes students are getting less assistance from the state as college costs rise yearly.

In fact, Langis said, 7,300 state students were denied scholarship aid this year. The amount of aid handed out to students, he added, decreased by 70 percent in the last two years.

SSAM is now relishing the recent victory of reducing the proposed 16-33 percent tuition increase for state schools to 6 percent for this year, Langis said.

Langis said he sees a day when public higher education is denied to more and more people. In addition, he said, "if costs continue to rise, then I think that will have a long-term effect on the future. This will have a dramatic effect on the Massachusetts economy."

He also predicts enrollment decreases which would in turn hurt the schools themselves.

Referring to his own schooling by means of public universities, Langis said that if it wasn't for his access to affordable schooling, he wouldn't be where he is today.

"I think now we are seeing education becoming for the wealthy," he said.

Alexander Yakovlev also said Gorbachev would issue the decrees after lawmakers conclude a special session.

Just 20 minutes into yesterday's Congress session, Gorbachev ordered a recess because of "very serious remarks and proposals" from the Russian, Ukrainian and other delegations.

It was not immediately clear if Gorbachev's plan was in trouble. After a similarly ordered break in the first day of the session Monday, all the republics' delegations lined up behind the proposal.

One deputy told reporters that leaders of the republics' delegations needed to assure lawmakers they would have some sort of future role if they agreed to the proposal. The measures would effectively dissolve the Congress.

"This break has been called so the republic can bribe them (the lawmakers)," said Svyatislav Fyodorov, a lawmaker and noted eye surgeon.

A plan circulated by Russian legislators would shift almost all power into two of the interim government bodies proposed by Gorbachev, a governing council and an inter-republic committee that would set economic policy.

That would leave little power for an interim legislature.

Leaders of Russia, the dominant republic with most of the Soviet Union's riches and half its population, oppose giving too much power to Gorbachev and a what they fear would be too conservative a legislature.

The so-called State Council would comprise the Soviet president and leaders of the republics. The economic committee, comprised of the president and republic representatives, would coordinate economic policy.

The Gorbachev proposal urges all republics, whether or not they choose to maintain political ties with the Kremlin, to enter into an economic union.

Move-in Day a Success

By AHVA DAVIS
Collegian Staff

The sky was clear, the air was warm and the sun was shining. There was a certain excitement in the air over the University of Massachusetts on Sunday and Monday as thousands of first-year students moved into the residence halls.

The summer flew by and it is already time to start school again. For returning students move-in day means seeing old friends, finding out where they live and where the party is that night.

Some of the new students may have other things on their mind. Many are filled with nervous anticipation about what college life has in store for them, and if they will be able to survive moving in.

Despite these worries, moving in this year was "smooth and well organized," said one security guard.

There were extra students on hand to help new students move into their residence halls.

"The parents appreciated the extra student help," continued the guard.

When the other students arrived on Monday, UMass really came to life.

In Southwest residential area, students waited with their crates, suitcases, lamps, televisions, pillows and other "necessities" for an elevator to take them to their upper floor rooms. Some people had to wait over an hour.

"People might consider bringing a book to read," said one frustrated parent waiting for an elevator.

The overall thought about move-in day was that it went very well, without any disasters. One student aide said that "everyone cooperated really well and things ran smoothly."

Despite the frustration of waiting and getting settled, eventually everyone got to their rooms. Traffic did back up at some residence halls in several areas, but everyone looked excited about being back, or being here for the first time.

In September 1990, the Office of Solid Waste Management was created by the Physical Plant to coordinate and implement an integrated solid waste management plan for UMass.

Some of OSWM's recent accomplishments are the creation of mixed paper recycling programs, scrap metal collection and even tire reycling.

During the summer, OSWM shipped 24 tons of used vehicle tires to a recycling plant.

as students juggled add-drop forms, No. 2 pencils and their schedules, attempting to add the proper course to make their schedules work, an often daunting task.

"This is so aggravating," said Marianne Hess, a junior political science major. She was waiting in line at MacImer, flipping through a course guide searching for a course to add to her schedule because she did not receive her courses required for her major.

Hess was upset since she was being forced to sign up for the more accessible introductory courses. "Here I am a junior taking all 100-level courses," Hess said.

Japanese exchange student Mieko Matsushita waited in the political science add-drop line for one hour until she realized it was the wrong building. She said she felt "very miserable and hopeless" over her schedule.

Out of the three political science courses Matsushita had signed up for her major, two were cancelled and one was oversubscribed, leaving her with a nearly empty schedule.

Matsushita, who remained in amazingly good spirits throughout the entire ordeal, promised to work hard in the courses that she waited hours to add.

In the add-drop line in Hills-South, one frazzled student loudly said: "You think the University could come up with a better system than this."

Following the lead of some other universities who allow all students to add-drop by phone, UMass is testing an add-drop hotline.

Out of the 1,976 students who were asked to participate in this new program because they had underloaded schedules (less than 12 credits), 1,131 students participated in the hotline. The students added a total of 3,274 courses, and did not have to wait in any line to get the courses they needed or wanted.

Despite the frustrations of add-drop, some students were philosophical about the experience. Mike Janes, a sophomore biochemistry major, got to the line for German classes in Herter Hall at 2 a.m., long before most others.

"I wanted to be sure I got my class," Janes said. "I figure you go through it once a semester — you wait six hours and make sure you get the class you want."

Needless to say, Janes made it into German 110 as he hoped.

Anthony said several teams that they weren't even scheduled to play sponsored UMass games against other teams.

The program is also planning fundraising throughout the season, including efforts at games such as selling T-shirts, Anthony said.

"We had our money and our schedule set up," Anthony said. "We had too many commitments made for them to stop it."

"Coming up with that much money inside of two weeks says a lot about their desire," Ben Doherty, the chairman of the Athletic Committee of the Board of Trustees at the time, said. "It's a real Cinderella story."

Judge Controls Info Flow in Smith Rape Trial

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — The judge in the William Kennedy Smith rape case ruled prosecutors must get her approval before releasing any more information about other alleged sexual attacks by him.

Circuit Judge Mary Lupo said Tuesday she wants to review such information before deciding whether it should be made public or admitted as evidence.

"I don't want the community further polluted without reviewing in advance" the material, she said.

Defense attorney Roy Black warned the judge that publicity is wrecking Smith's chances for a fair trial, and "the only possible remedy is going to be a dismissal of the charges."

Smith, 31, goes on trial Jan. 13 on charges he raped a Jupiter, Fla. woman at the Kennedy family's Palm Beach estate.

His lawyers plan to take sworn statements from three other women who claim the nephew of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) attacked them as well.

Also, a letter in the court filed Tuesday referred to a possible statement from another woman who has claimed in news interviews that Smith attacked her.

Prosecutors on July 22 said they planned to call the three other women as witnesses. They earlier released sworn statements from the women, who told authorities that they never reported the alleged attacks to police.

Lupo denied requests by Smith's attorneys Tuesday seeking new restrictions on news media access to pretrial information.

But she agreed to block release of materials sought by news organizations, including The Associated Press, until Thursday to let Smith's lawyers appeal.

The material includes about 20 depositions from police, a rape counselor and a doctor and nurse who examined Smith's accuser, now 30, after the alleged rape.

More doctors recommend extra-strength HP.

More and more PhDs across the country are recommending Hewlett-Packard financial and scientific calculators to their students. And for some very strong reasons.

"The HP-48SX Scientific Expandable has powerful graphics tools that are remarkably helpful to students learning mathematical concepts. And with the equation solver feature, it's excellent for applying mathematics to engineering," according to Dr. William Rahmeyer, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at Utah State University.

"The HP Business Consultant II has an equation solver and extensive math functions. These free the students from computational tedium so they can think and interact on a higher level," says Dr. Lee V. Stiff, a professor of math education at North Carolina State University.

So go check out the HP calculator line at your college bookstore or HP retailer. You'll agree, there's no faster relief from the pain of tough problems.

Hyundai Not Interested

BOSTON (AP) — The chairman of the manufacturer of Korean Hyundai automobiles has told Gov. William F. Weld the company is not interested now in buying the now-closed General Motors manufacturing plant in Framingham.

Weld met with Chung Se Yung, chairman of Hyundai Business Group, in Seoul Tuesday and indicated tax incentives might be thrown into any deal for the idle plant.

Chung said he wanted to know why General Motors moved out of the plant before Hyundai moved into it.

Chung was told that labor problems and costs were parts of General Motors decision to shut the plant in 1989.

He said his company often looked at methods of Japanese car manufacturers, and that the Japanese often built new plants rather than take over old ones.

Taking over old plants sometimes means inheriting obligations to unions that represented former workers there, he said, and the Japanese pay workers about half what American companies pay.

It was suggested that a new Hyundai plant would be welcome in Massachusetts, but Chung said, "It wouldn't be a good idea to build with American plants shutting down."

"The automobile industry is in such chaos that everybody is losing money," he said. "Today, nobody is starting to build."

Weld suggested arranging for Hyundai officials to see the plant, but Chung said, "We should wait until everything settles down. Then we'll decide what to do."

Massachusetts Economic Affairs Secretary Daniel Gregory said other Asian manufacturers were asked about taking over the Framingham plant, but he declined to identify them or elaborate.

Weld and his entourage were coming home Wednesday night after a whirlwind two-week visit to the Far East, invigorated by the enthusiasm Asians showed in working with Americans.

"I'm stunned by the eagerness of Asians to do business with us," he said. "I have a sense of the power of the Asian economies that I'd not had before, a sense of urgency about the application of technology to carry some of these economies, notably Korea and Taiwan."

Weld said his first official trip to the Pacific left him impressed by th powerful economies of the five regions he visited — Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, South Korea and Guanodong Province in China.

Constitutional or not:

Harshbarger approves 25 initiative petitions

BOSTON (AP) — A proposal to limit the number of terms Massachusetts lawmakers can serve and another to establish a graduated state income tax were among 25 of 44 initiative petitions that state Attorney Scott Harshbarger said were valid Wednesday.

Now the initiative sponsors must get little more than 70,000 petition signatures by November, and proposed constitutional amendments, if two successive Legislatures approve them, would be up for a vote in November 1994.

"The petitions that were certified are the ones that met the constitutional criteria of the initiative process," Harshbarger said. "When the facts and the law demonstrated that a particular petition did not pass constitutional muster, that petition was not certified."

Harshbarger ruled that four anti-gay rights petitions were unconstitutional because two of the 10 people who originally signed the initiative withdrew their signatures.

"The fact that these two poeple removed their names show there simply isn't any credible support for homophobic efforts anymore," said David LaFontaine, director of the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights.

One petition Harshbarger certified was a proposed constitutional amendment that would abolish the state's requirement of a flat income tax rate. Measures similar to that one, sponsored by the Tax Equity Alliance of Massachusetts, have been rejected by voters four times in the past three decades.

A graduated income tax would require people who earn more money to pay higher taxes than those who earn less money. The current income tax rate is 6.25 percent for everyone, regardless of their income. The figure is slated to drop to 5.95 percent in January.

The rate is 12 percent on unearned income, such as stock dividends.

Five proposed amendments, sponsored by Limits on Incumbent Politicians, would limit U.S. senators from Massachusetts to two six-year terms, and hold representatives to four two-year terms. The governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, treasurer, attorney general and auditor would be limited to two four-year terms.

Organization director Dorothy Thomas-Vitrac said she was "certain there were a lot of happy citizens around the state tonight who have been waiting a long time to do something that would bring government back to the people."

HAIR OF THE DOG — Two Chinese crested dogs, hairless except for the tufts on their heads, are displayed Monday at the annual Adelaide Show where they captured first and second place in their class. Due to the lack of hair on their bodies, the dogs are very susceptible to sunburn and their owners had to apply sunblock lotion to the dogs before they were displayed outdoors.

Group: No more L.A. Law

CHICAGO (AP) — An organization of divorce lawyers — trying to clean up its members' "L.A. Law" image as legal lotharios — has adopted guidelines governing such things as sleeping with clients and using children as weapons.

"The public thinks most lawyers are Arnie Beckers. Most divorce lawyers are not Arnie Beckers." Sanford Dranoff, president of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers, said Tuesday, referring to the series' sleazy divorce lawyer.

The Chicago-based group has drafted non-binding guidelines that call for avoiding the use of youngsters as bargaining chips, steering clear of sexual entanglements with clients, avoiding harassment of opposing attorneys, recommending reconciliation when appropriate and considering the welfare of the children.

The group, which represents about 1,200 of the nation's 40,000 divorce lawyers, already has general ethical guidelines, but these are the first to deal specifically with sexual issues and certain other matters, Dranoff said.

The California bar recently passed a measure barring lawyers from demanding or coercing sex with a client. When sexual relations do occur, the lawyers must prove the relationship didn't interfere with their professional representation.

The amendment, subject to the California Supreme Court's approval, recently was sent back to the bar for additional public review.

The American Bar Association, which represents about half the nation's 750,000 lawyers, is not considering guidelines specifically for divorce attorneys, said George Kuhlman, ABA ethics counsel. The ABA has guidelines for lawyers in general.

Mary Becker, a law professor at the University of Chicago, said the academy's guidelines probably won't change the perception of divorce lawyers as "sharks who go in and make things worse."

Soviet Statues Fall From Grace

MOSCOW (AP) — For four decades, Felix Dzerzhinsky's bronze image towered over one of Moscow's busiest intersections, a constant reminder of the hated secret police force he founded. Now he lies on his back in a new park for discredited statues along the Moscow River.

Dzerzhinsky's companions include Stalin in broken red granite and monuments to other Bolshevik revolutionaries pulled from their pedestals in the anti-communist euphoria that followed last month's failed coup.

The Moscow City Council rescued the statues from warehouses or destruction and has given them a new home on tree-shaded lawn between an art gallery and the posh Communist Party-owned Oktyabrskya Hotel in central Moscow.

A committee has been appointed to decide the future of other monuments honoring heroes of the 1917 Bolshevik revolution, the Tass news agency quoted Vladimir Darmidontov, deputy chairperson of the city council's cultural heritage commission, as saying.

"It is our history and it should not be destroyed," said Pvotr Yakovlev, an engineer strolling past the statues with his young daughter. "It doesn't matter what the history is like, it should be kept."

The most popular of the eight busts and statues appears to be the 14-ton likeness of Dzerzhinsky, which was hoisted off its pedestal outside KGB headquarters by five cranes Aug. 22.

Dzerzhinsky was a Polish aristocrat who sided with the Bolsheviks and was asked by Lenin to organize a KGB precursor, the dreaded security force known as the Cheka.

Popular Moscow folklore has it that the communist party's reputedly vast gold holdings were stored inside Dzerzhinsky's statue — perhaps explaining why so many people paused to peer inside his now hollow, prostrate frame.

All that was found was a torn sack of cement and a lot of rust.

Sharing the tranquil park with Dzerzhinsky is an imposing, 20-foot statue of Yakov Sverdlov that once stood in front of the Bolshoi Theater.

A close associate of Lenin, Sverdlov is widely believed to have played a role in the slayings of the last Russian czar, Nicholas II, and his family.

Seated nearby is Bolshevik leader Mikhail Kalnin, relocated from a street named after him.

Mom sentenced to 15 years for solicitation of murder

HOUSTON (AP) — A jury Wednesday sentenced a suburban homemaker to 15 years in prison and fined her $10,000 for trying to hire a hitman to kill the mother of her daughter's rival for a spot on their school's cheerleading squad.

Prosecutors had asked for the maximum life prison term for Wanda Holloway, 37, of Channelview, who was convicted Tuesday of solicitation for murder.

Hours before being sentenced, a sobbing Mrs. Holloway begged for mercy.

"I think that this trial has been enough punishment for me," Wanda Holloway said, sobbing on the stand. "I'm totally humiliated . . . I would love a second chance."

Mrs. Holloway was convicted Tuesday of solicitation of capital murder in attempting to hire a hitman to kill Verna Heath. The crime carried a possible sentence of five years to life in prison and fines up to $10,000.

Holloway had no previous felony conviction. That made her eligible for five to 10 years' probation instead of prison.

Assistant District Attorney Mike Anderson told the jurors the only thing worse than Mrs. Holloway's crime would have been if Mrs. Heath and her daughter, Amber, were killed.

"If they were dead, it would be a capital murder," Anderson said.

The penalty for capital murder is life in prison or death by injection.

Defense lawyer Troy McKinney advised jurors they could recommend counseling and community service as part of probation.

"By giving Wanda Holloway probation, you're not saying that what happened to Verna Heath is right," defense lawyer Troy McKinney said. "She can't make it right from a prison cell. There's no way."

The key witness against Mrs. Holloway was Terry Harper, brother of her ex-husband. Harper has testified his former sister-in-law wanted him to find a killer.

He said Mrs. Holloway believed killing Amber Heath's mother would compel the girl to drop out of running for the high school cheerleading squad. That in turn would have given Shanna Harper, Mrs. Holloway's daughter, a better shot at the squad. Shanna did not try out after her mother's arrest in January.

Shanna lost a bid for a junior high cheerleading squad to Amber in the seventh grade. And Shanna was disqualified from eighth-grade competition for campaigning by giving away rulers and pencils with her name printed on them.

Both girls, now 14 and high school freshmen, were in court Wednesday.

Terry Harper said he reported the matter out of concern for the Heaths. In the ensuing investigation, he secretly recorded conversations he had with Mrs. Holloway in January.

After her arrest, police described Mrs. Holloway as the "ultimate stage mother."

The defense countered that Terry Harper set up Mrs. Holloway to help his brother win custody of the couple's two children. Mrs. Holloway's ex-husband, Tony Harper, won custody shortly after her arrest Jan. 30.

McKinney told jurors Mrs. Holloway initially thought Harper was joking about having Mrs. Heath killed.

Murder Arouses Child Abuse Debate

JERUSALEM (AP) — The discovery by a haystack of an 11-year-old boy's battered corpse is stirring national debate about how Israel, and its kibbutz collective farms in particular, deals with child abuse.

The case of Zohar Paz defies the pristine image of kibbutz as communal ideal. Children's rights advocates say it is also alarming because it dovetails with increasing reports of child beatings nationwide, which they estimate at 30,000 a year.

A photograph of a wide-eyed, dark-haired Zohar stared out of every Israeli neeuaesday and legislators and children's rights advocates questioned whether laws about child abuse were being adequately enforced.

Hanita Zimrin, chairperson of the Israeli Children's Defense League, said Zohar Paz's tragedy points to a tendency of close-knit groups in Israel to cover family violence.

At Kibbutz Shoval in southern Israel, where Zohar lived, officials insisted they concealed nothing from the authorities. They also denied allegations that the boy was known to be battered at home before the slaying.

Police said that Zohar, whose body was found Monday morning, clearly was beaten to death.

They have arrested the 53-year-old boyfriend of Zohar's kibbutznik mother and his 17-year-old son, southern district spokesperson Shalom Ben-Hemo said. The man and his son live in the nearby city of Beersheba.

Ben-Hemo said that Zohar, who suffered from epilepsy and impaired motor development, was found in a tub inside a shack about 11 hours after officials reported him missing.

The boy apparently left his home sometime Saturday afternoon, Ben-Hemo said.

A far-reaching law requires Israelis to report any suspicion of child abuse. Offenders can be jailed for three months — six months in the case of social workers, Mrs. Zimrin said.

But she knew of no case where offenders were punished.

Legislators demanded a probe into why police never received complaints that Paz was being battered.

"This is a most unusual case. By our whole approach, child abuse just goes against the grain. But I guess exceptions can happen anywhere," said Shalom Haver, a senior kibbutz movement official.

About 3 percent of Israel's 4.7 million people live on kibbutzim.

Shoval's secretary, Gadi Romem, denied Paz was a battered child based on the accounts of teachers and social workers who handled the boy.

Romem said the boy's mother suffered from stress after his father died in an auto accident seven years ago.

Romem also said a foster family had been arranged for Zohar and he was to have moved in with it the day he died.

Mrs. Zimrin estimates that about 30,000 child beatings occur in Israel annually, about eight of them fatal. She said these figures correspond proportionately to the number of such deaths reported in the United States in 1990.

Life, death and the GOP

Welcome back, people of this University. As you already know, (or maybe you don't), this fine editorial page is infamously known for its liberal reputation. I find it hard to believe that on this diverse campus, more opinions of a conservative nature aren't written (printed).

Speaking of opinions, here are some of mine: Doug Dagarin, Republican candidate for the state senate seat vacated by John Olver, has some great opinions. For instance, Dagarin exhorts the majority to speak up for their rights, lest they be trampled by minorities. It sounds simple, doesn't it? Not at this campus.

Michael Morrisey

Unfortunately, groups like Queer Nation have taken this expression idea a little too far. Last year, they irresponsibly damaged the Republican Club's office for no reason whatsoever. Meanwhile, the Republicans work as hard to spread their (sometimes radical) ideas across campus, yet they don't get the publicity because they don't trash other groups' offices.

Unfortunately for the citizens of Hampshire County, Mr. Dagarin is a bit too radical. He believes there is a "cure" for homosexuality, according to the Boston Herald, primarily through "prayer." What the hell is that?

Is Dagarin going to make every homosexual go to mandatory church services on Sunday? Let people be who they want to be, and do not interfere in their lives!

Add it all up, and I figure by next week Doug Dagarin will be the poster boy for the Republican Club.

Next topic: birth eradication. You may know it as abortion. RU 486? R U friggin nuts?

You see, I refer to it as birth eradication because I don't want to confuse it with birth control. Birth control is intelligent planning before the fact, while birth eradication is always used after the fact, usually in place of birth control.

Obviously, we live in an imperfect world where situations like rape and incest are all too prevalent. Abortion must also be used in order to save a mother's life.

Regrettably, abortion is already all too prevalent in American society, so much so that terminating a pregnancy may cause as much trouble as having a child.

Speaking of death, let's move to euthanasia, another favorite party topic. Why don't we just kill everyone over 70 anyways? Hell, all they do is pick up Social Security and live in Florida, or at least that's what some people would have you believe. Are you listening, Hemlock Society? Isn't that how Hitler started?

Finally, I need feedback from you students. If you agree, drop me a line at 113 Campus Center. Think I'm crazy? Tell me. Come on down and write a counter-editorial. I hope to hear from you, 'cuz y'all be hearing a lot from me.

Add/drop means early morning campout — even for seniors

I have only three things to say about the streets of Amherst at 5 a.m. It's dark, it's cold and it's creepy as hell if you're all alone on your bike.

I know this first hand because in the early morning hours on that ever so dreaded day of add/drop, I was on my way to beg for classes.

As I peddled along (with two flats) the only image that kept appearing across my mind was the newspaper headline, "UMass senior abducted early one morning on her way to get classes."

Felice Cohen

The streets were deserted; my heart raced in my chest. For some reason I wasn't scared about being out all alone. What was running through my mind instead was explaining to my parents why I was taking six gym classes so that I would be able to maintain my status as a student at this University.

I was always under the impression that being a student meant taking classes. But here I am, a senior with hopes of graduating next spring, and only two classes to my name. What is the point of paying for an education of classes that we don't want?

Maybe we should defer payment until after we get our classes.

Arriving at Machmer Hall, I was no longer in awe of the fact that I was up so early, but that I was tenth in line. What time had they woken up?

Settling into a cozy spot on the hard floor at the end of the line, I asked what classes the others were waiting for.

Having summed up the courage to ask, it turned out that six of them wanted the same class as I did. After finding out that there were only five open spaces, I began scanning the course book for other classes.

So there I was lying on my side, curled up in a fetal position trying to get comfortable. My ribs crushed between me and the cement floor, my head resting gently on my add/drop sheet, I began to doze off only to be awoken with fears of paranoia.

"What if someone tried to cut in front of me in line?" No, I had to stay awake. It was my only means of survival.

As the morning wore on and the sun made its first appearance, the crowd had grown into a swarm of desperate-looking faces. With forlorn looks in their eyes, they took their seats among the rest of us.

Soon Machmer Hall began resembling Penn Station. A student summed up the scene when he exclaimed "This place looks like a refugee camp."

He wasn't too far from the truth.

There were people sprawled out on the floor sleeping, others talking with friends they hadn't seen all summer and some playing cards.

I myself tried my hand at solitaire only to be left with the hope that my luck would be better getting classes.

Two and a half hours later, a faculty member appeared. The crowd rose to their feet as if he were some God, the Add/Drop God, there to bring relief to these poor, desperate students.

Inching my way up the line, my hopes grew dimmer as each student before me was signed in to the class that I wanted.

Leaving Machmer, second on the waiting list and still not enough classes to sneeze at, I realized that I shouldn't be too depressed. I mean, if I received all the classes that I wanted, then I would just have to wait in line at the textbook annex.

Government neglect means elderly miss out on benefits

Editor's note: The following is a syndicated column from National Forum, a service of the AFL-CIO.

If someone stole $30 from an 85-year-old widow living on the edge of poverty, you would say it was a heartless crime.

Ron Pollack

And if that same 85-year-old widow were forced to pay more than $700 for medical treatment she was legally entitled to, you would say that was an outrage.

But both of these things are happening every day to two million unsuspecting older Americans. Why?

Most seniors have $29.90 deducted each month from their Social Security checks for Medicare physician coverage. But in 1988, Congress enacted important reforms to help protect the poorest of America's seniors from skyrocketing health care costs, by picking up their bill for Medicare services.

This was a victory for senior citizens. It was a plan that made sense. What went wrong?

Even though Congress passed these reforms into law, the government is still deducting $29.90 a month from Social Security checks of millions of poor seniors who are eligible for this new protection. And, when they get sick, those same elderly poor are still forced to spend hundreds of dollars that, by law, they shouldn't have to pay.

Four million older Americans are poor enough to qualify for protection from these out-of-pocket costs, but fewer than half actually receive the protection. The problem is that you can't get this benefit unless you apply for it. And you can't apply for it if you don't know about the benefit.

The plain truth is that the government has neglected to even notify people of their rights. And the bureaucrats keep wrongfully taking $29.90 out of 2.2 million Social Security checks every month.

The government's failure to meet its obligation to these vulnerable older Americans is especially glaring when you realize how easily the problem could be solved. A simple note of explanation could be sent out with the next mailing of Social Security checks. And the government could get in touch with seniors through local senior citizens' centers, and by radio and TV.

The government should go beyond simply notifying seniors about the benefit. Other ways of enrolling eligible seniors for the benefit should be pursued, including better outreach, more places to get information and apply (doctors' offices and hospitals, to name a few) and perhaps more importantly, allowing people to apply at Social Security offices, not just welfare offices.

Benefits should also be provided after-the-fact to seniors who did not know they were entitled to assistance.

At a time when so many programs are being slashed because budgets are tight, it's especially heartbreaking when many of our poorest seniors are not receiving a benefit that has already been budgeted for and approved. The money is there. It's waiting.

Thirty dollars a month and $728 a year in Medicare deductibles may not seem like a lot to the bureaucrats in Washington, but it's a small fortune to poor seniors who rely on Social Security and Medicare.

A promise was made to our parents and grandparents. The promise should be kept.

Letters to the Editor

Plaque carries more than just a simple hello

The First Week poster advertising events for the Student Activities Office caught my eye as I examined its graphics which represented the future.

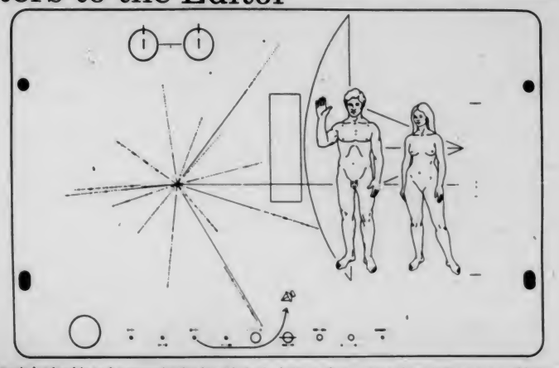
One of the graphics is a copy of the image of a woman and a man engraved on the Pioneer 10 spacecraft launched in February 1972, the first spacecraft to leave the solar system. The power relationship between the female and male greatly disturbs me. The image is the brain child of Carl Sagan and Frank Drake. It was drawn by Linda Sagan.

The male in the image is holding up his right hand, which the creators say represents a universal sign of good will. The woman's distant look is unassertive and as if she is unaware of what's going on, letting the male take on the cultural role of ultimate communicator. Her legs are set apart as if she is ready at any moment to become his sexual slave.

In their essay, "A Message from Earth," Sagan, Sagan and Drake write, "We hope this man and woman are representative of all mankind."

Tragically enough, it seems as if their symbol does represent the vast majority of patriarchal, heterosexual, parasitic relationships. Their image is certainly not one of a woman's liberation, but one of male domination.

Sagan, Sagan and Drake have cast into deep space the symbol of the cause of the nuclear arms race, the equation of our species extinction, if this war against woman as equal contributor in leadership and communication is not halted.



Any intelligent extra-terrestrial who might discover the engraving is more than likely to discern from their power relationship that the human race is not a species of love and wisdom, which would welcome and honor new forms of life, but one of rape, war and omnicide, a race quickly destroying life on planet Earth.

Coup failure promises hope

In recent days when headlines screamed "Gorbachev Ousted," it seemed the entire world was gripped by the catalysmic upheaval in the Soviet Union. Indeed, much of the world was tuned in as the fruits of the television age — usually far more paltry — revealed a nation perched between light and darkness, hope and repression.

Perhaps United States citizens were especially transfixed by events in Moscow; indeed, after committing a large bulk of our national treasure to the Cold War for over 40 years — and the stubborn hope for the "peace dividend" to help renew the states — was something seemingly all Americans could embrace.

Even President Bush, despite the lines of stress etched in his face, seemed transformed during the crisis. His unequivocal support for the entrapped Mikhail Gorbachev and the stirring populist leader, Boris Yeltsin, showed that moral leadership can emanate, at least on occasion, from the Capitol.

When the coup d'etat finally collapsed, cowed into the ash heap of history by a long-suffering populace that would no longer stomach the bureaucratic dictates of gray men, one's belief in the possibility of human progress was reborn.

Perhaps in the final analysis, grisly memories of Tiananmen Square and Auschwitz and the homeless in the United States are only a backdrop.

Perhaps it is the soul of a nation, its aspiration for self-determination and responsive government which is the ultimate measure. One can only hope that such zeal graces these shores soon.

Dahmer moved to state prison for '89 conviction

MADISON, Wis. (AP)—Jeffrey L. Dahmer, who admitted killing and dismembering seven men and boys, was transferred Tuesday from Milwaukee County Jail to a state prison when his probation in a molestation case was revoked.

Dahmer must serve the rest of the 5-year sentence for child molestation at a Columbia County prison in Portage, 40 miles north of Madison, said Michael Sulivan, deputy secretary of the State Department of Corrections.

Dahmer, 31, a former factory worker, was arrested after police found the remains of 11 dismembered bodies in his Milwaukee County Court. Dahmer has admitted killing 17 males since 1978. No charges have been filed in the other two in the absence of physical remains or other evidence.

When he was arrested, Dahmer was on probation for a 1989 conviction for sexually assaulting a 15-year-old boy. He had offered the teenager $50 to pose nude for photos.

Dahmer served 10 months of a 5-year sentence before his release.

Sullivan said Dahmer's arrest and the subsequent charges against him violated his probation.

Noriega to be Tried On Own

MIAMI (AP) — Manuel Noriega will face drug trafficking charges alone. The remaining co-defendant in his drug and racketeering trial pleaded guilty yesterday.

The plea came just before final pretrial motions were to be heard yesterday morning by U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler, with jury selection scheduled for today.

Accused drug pilot Daniel Miranda will face a maximum 30-month sentence, will receive a permanent U.S. visa and have his pilot's license restored under the plea bargain, said his attorney, Michael O'Kane.

Miranda, who already served three months in the federal Metropolitan Correctional Center before being released on bond, may have to serve no more than 30 additional days in prison, his lawyer said. The Panamanian pilot was accused of flying drug profits from Fort Lauderdale to Panama.

Miranda agreed to testify against the ousted Panamanian dictator if called upon. Sentencing was delayed until after the trial.

In another last-minute move prior to yesterday's hearing, federal prosecutors asked that one of the 11 counts Noriega faces be dropped. The judge agreed, signing an order overnight dropping the charge.

The charge dropped, one of 11 Noriega faced, alleged that Nori-ga caused Tony Aizorua, a drug-pilot-turned-informant, to travel from Fort Lauderdale to Panama in 1984 in furtherance of the cocaine-trafficking conspiracy.

The charge carries five years in prison, a fraction of the 145 years the Panamanian dictator faced if convicted on all counts.

Diane Cossin, spokesperson for the U.S. attorney's office, refused to explain prosecutors' reasons for dropping the charge.

Dead Again delivers a stylish scare

By JON LUPO
Collegian Correspondent

Good acting and stylish direction always lend support to a film, but in the case of Dead Again, it's a saving grace. Without it, this would have been a convoluted, confusing bore. With it, Dead Again is a thoroughly entertaining, old fashioned thriller.

It has all the ingredients of those great 1940s melodramas: the ever-twisting plot, a mysterious murder, a present lurking threat as well as a dose of reincarnation thrown in.

Second time director Kenneth Branagh (Henry V) plays cynical L.A. detective Mike Church, who is hired to find the identity of an amnesiac (Emma Thomson — Branagh's wife). She is having horrific visions of being murdered by a masked man with a pair of scissors. They meet up with a greedy antiques dealer (Derek Jacobi), who is also a hypnotist, and he places Thomson in a trance. It seems that the woman's visions resemble a famous Hollywood murder which was committed 43 years ago.

In black and white flashbacks, it is revealed that pianist Margaret Strauss (also played by Thomson) was apparently murdered by her husband, European conductor Roman Strauss (Branagh, also). He supposedly killed her over an affair he suspected she was having with journalist Gray Baker (Andy Garcia).

Strauss was convicted and put to death for the crime. It is determined that Thomson was Margaret Strauss in a past life . . . and Mike was Roman. The couple is drawn to each other, but is history doomed to repeat itself?

The plot doesn't end there. Writer Scott Frank put in enough twists and turns for two movies, but through it all, the script retains a keen sense of humor about itself. Branagh's stylish direction keeps the plot moving briskly and the audience believing it every step of the way.

Fine performances by all concerned help to keep the plot from self-destructing. Branagh plays Mike and Roman at opposite ends of the spectrum, making each character more believable. Emma Thomson is fine as the present day amnesiac, but she flourishes as Margaret Strauss. She is a victim, but she's not giving up without a fight.

Classical actor Derek Jacobi ("I Claudius" on PBS) is amusing as the antiques dealer and Andy Garcia adds another solid supporting performance to his career. Even Robin Williams, who has an extended cameo as a former shrink, is right on target.

Above all, Dead Again is a great edge-of-your-seat-thriller, guaranteed to make you jump. While it might not make you a believer in reincarnation, you'll never use scissors the same way again.

113 CAMPUS CENTER, IN THE BASEMENT 545-3500 JUST DO IT.

Fun flicks from the summer

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

Despite the problems in the economy and all the job shortages going on in Massachusetts, people still flocked to the ever exciting summer movies that graced (or, occasionally shamed) the big screen.

On my limited income as a summer camp counselor, I was able to see only a few of the summer movies, but here are some worth mentioning.

Comedies were a dime a dozen this summer with movies like What About Bob?, Hot Shots, Naked Gun 2 1/2, and Bill and Ted's Bogus Journey, but one particular film shone above the rest. City Slickers, starring brilliant-as-ever Billy Crystal, Daniel Stern and Bruno Kirby, was a movie that viewed middle-income men on the brink of a middle-age crisis.

Daniel Stern and Bruno Kirby were excellent in their own light, as they did not have to rely on Billy Crystal for character support; their characters had very definite, very unique personalities.

The one actor's performance that surprised me was that of Jack Pallance as the crusty range rider. He and Crystal interacted perfectly together throughout the movie, especially in the scene when Crystal breaks through Pallance's hard-as-rock exterior and has him admit his true feelings about life and love. Although this movie was clearly the best summer comedy in my mind, credit must be given to the slapstick Pure Luck.

Pure Luck stars Martin Short and Lethal Weapon's Danny Glover as unlikely partners in a kidnapping case. Though the plot is flimsy and the outcome is extremely predictable, Martin Short's performance as a bumbling klutz is well worth the money (well, maybe at the bargain matinee).

When one has comedy, one must also have tragedy, drama, suspense, action, love, revenge (did I cover everything?) . . . and all of that describes the absolutely breathtaking Robin Hood. I had friends who saw the movie just to hear the Brian Adams hit song at the end, but ended up truly enjoying the film.

Robin Hood stars Kevin Costner, who as always, was truly astounding in his role as the historic character. Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio portrayed well the sweet, innocent Maid Marion, and Christian Slater was more than adequate in his depiction of Robin Hood's brother. But the truly astonishing performances were, without a doubt, by Morgan Freeman and Alan Rickman.

Morgan Freeman plays a character who, ironically, never existed in the Robin Hood tale, but ended up practically stealing the show. Alan Rickman, who is best known for his portrayal of the vicious villain in Die Hard, was stupendous as the wicked Sheriff of Nottingham.

The only complaints I had about the movie were Costner's unconvincing (rather, nonexistent) English accent, and the use of anachronistic props, such as the telescope. Other than that, "Robin Hood" is a definite lock-in for Oscar nominations too numerous to mention.

Well, that's the summer wrap-up for 1991. Although the box-office totals were considerably lower this year from last, I feel that the raising of ticket prices was more of a factor than the movies themselves. All in all the summer line-up was far superior to that of 1990. So, if you still haven't caught any of the hot summer films, it would be well worth the trip to a theater near you.

Family farms presented in art show

Hampden Gallery, a program of the Fine Arts Center, will be presenting an eclectic schedule of exhibits throughout the year that will recall history — celebrate it and question it; provoke thoughts and feelings; and continue to acknowledge and explore artistic cultural diversity. Artists from the area, as well as from New York and the Northeast region, will be represented.

Beginning the season will be the photography and text exhibit entitled Founding Farms: Five Massachusetts Family Farms 1683-Present by UMass Campus Chronicle photographer Stan Sherer from Northampton and Chronicle writer Michael E. C. Gery of Ashfield, from September 8 through 27 with an opening reception on September 12 from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Founding Farms is composed of 50 black-and-white photographs, excerpts from interviews with the farm families and a 40-page book profiling five of the oldest family farms in Massachusetts.

The book contains 20 photographs, prose profiles of each farm and an introduction by Hugh Hawkins, professor of American Studies at Amherst College. The project recognizes the significance of family farms to the heritage and culture of Massachusetts. Each of these farms has remained in the family of its founder for more than 200 years.

The images evoke a deep sense of the history, place, work and family imbedded in these farms. Text and image combine to create a beautiful reflection and tribute to the hard work and pride of our founding farmers.

Country singer Dotty West dies

NASHVILLE, Tenn (AP) — Country singer Dotty West died yesterday of injuries suffered in a car wreck last week on the way to performing at the Grand Ole Opry.

The 58-year-old singer/songwriter, who won country music's first Grammy for a female vocalist, died at 9:43 a.m., said Barbara Cramer, spokeswoman for Vanderbilt University Medical Center.

West died during a third operation yesterday morning to repair her liver, which was severely damaged in Friday's car accident.

She was probably best known for the hit song "Country Sunshine" and duets with Kenny Rogers, who praised her today as someone who "sang emotions" rather than words.

Her career spanned more than 25 years and yielded solo hits like "Here Comes My Baby", the 1964 hit that won the first Grammy for country music performance by a female vocalist.

Her late 1970s duets with Rogers produced a series of hits, including "Every Time Two Fools Collide" and "What Are We Doin' in Love?"

In a statement yesterday, Rogers said that when West "sang about pain, she felt pain; when she sang about love she felt love and when she sang about beauty she felt that beauty. While some people sang words, she sang emotions."

Rogers had gone to Nashville on Tuesday to visit his friend and told her she would get better and they would record together.

In recent years, West's financial fortunes had tumbled and she was forced to file for bankruptcy in 1990 with more than $1 million in debts.

The IRS held an auction of West's belongings during the annual Country Music Fan Fair this summer. West attended, signed autographs and bid on some of the items.

West underwent emergency surgery the night of her accident and again on Monday to repair deep cuts in her liver. Neither operation successfully stopped the bleeding, surgeons later said.

She had been driven to the Opry by George Thackston, 81, who also was critically injured in the accident. Thackston's wife, Billye Ruth, said West's car had broken down and she asked him for a ride.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR ALL FOREIGN STUDENTS AND SCHOLARS

As you may know, a fire on 11 April 1991 destroyed the William S. Clark International Center which had housed the entire International Programs Office. Since that date, the International Programs Office - which includes the Office of Foreign Students and Scholars has been located in the North Reading Room of the Goodell Library. Effective with the start of the Fall 1991 Semester, there will be some changes in office function and staff location as follows:

1. The International Programs Office will remain in the Goodell Library and, while full services of the Office of Overseas Study and Exchange will be available at that location, only limited services of the Office of Foreign Students and Scholars will be available in the Goodell Library. Most of the Foreign Student Advisors will be located in MIDDLESEX HOUSE and we ask that foreign students and scholars observe the following procedures:

A. If you need routine paperwork (for example, a certification of attendance, an extension of stay, a signature) which does not require that you see a Foreign Student Advisor, simply go to the International Programs Office in the Goodell Library to make this request. We will give you a form to complete and will have the necessary documents ready in 2-4days.

B. If you wish to speak with a Foreign Student Advisor by telephone, call 545-2843; this telephone - our main number - is located in Goodell and your call will be transferred to the appropriate person. If he/she does not answer the telephone within 4 rings, Voice Mail will intercept and allow you to leave a recorded message.

C. If you wish to see a Foreign Student Advisor AND IT IS NOT AN EMERGENCY, telephone 545-2843 and ask to speak with an Advisor to make an appointment. If you wish to see a specific person, please provide this information when you call. There will usually be a wait of 1-2 days for an appointment.

D. If there is an EMERGENCY and it is possible for you to call before you come in, please do so. If there is not time, simply go to either Goodell or Middlesex House and someone will see you immediately.

2. The changes in location for the Foreign Student Advisors are as follows

CAROLE CUMPS - 210 MIDDLESEX- Monday, Tuesday afternoon, Wednesday, Thursday
GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Friday
JANET JOHNSON - 208 MIDDLESEX-Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday afternoon, Friday
GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Monday
FRED SCHULTEN - 210 MIDDLESEX - all day on Friday
GOODELL LIBRARY - Monday, Tuesday morning, Wednesday, Thursday
PAT VOKBUS - 207 MIDDLESEX - Monday, Wednesday morning, Thursday, Friday
GOODELL LIBRARY - all day on Tuesday

3. We ask that you not "drop in" at Middlesex House unless there is an EMERGENCY. We also ask that you do not make routine requests at Middlesex; we do not have the necessary materials to process them there and will have to refer you to Goodell.

4. If your requests or questions involve immigration matters, please be certain to have passport and visa documents with you.

We regret the need for this change in how our office functions and we recognize that these changes may create inconveniences. Our dual locations in Goodell and Middlesex are temporary ones, and as soon as we have a permanent location again housing the entire staff of the International Programs Office, we will be able to return to our normal methods of operation.

A conversation on and around music with Yusef Lateef

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

Yusef Lateef, simply put, is a living legend. He has been on the music scene since the fifties, and was one of the first African-American improvisational musicians to incorporate traditional idioms and styles of cultures such as Asia and Africa into Black American music.

Lateef is well-versed on many instruments, including the tenor saxophone and flute. He has played and recorded with a who's who of African-American music. In 1987, he won a Grammy for his Little Symphony. He teaches here at the University, and his latest release is entitled Lateef's Encounters on Atlantic records, which came out this summer.

The following is a transcript of an interview between myself and Mr. Lateef which was recorded on June 10, 1991.

JM: When I interview musicians, I like to find out how they describe their own music. "Jazz" is a term which has many connotations, both good and bad. If you would not characterize your music as "jazz", how would you describe it?

YL: That question is too broad. A lot of music is referred to as "jazz", and this is a problem. I think people who give out information, they are educators. To refer to something as "jazz" is not definitive. In fact, to do that would be to do a disservice to the musicians as I see it. We have to re-educate ourselves, and quit defining music that has serious elements of content that can be analyzed analytically in terms of rhythm, harmony, melody and sentiments. We have to quit defining them with these loose, fallacious terms.

JM: Before we started the interview, I had read you some liner notes from an album of yours where you were compared to Charles Mingus. I noticed that you seemed taken aback. Is there an image control problem? Since so much is written about artists, it must be impossible to keep up with everything that is written about you and your music.

YL: I wasn't taken aback, it was a compliment. But I do think that there is an image control. Again, this is doing a disservice to the musicians.

JM: How do you tie that into the marketability of a musician, and the commercialism of the artists' world?

YL: Well, the damage that I see lies in the respect that they should have. When you look in the dictionary and find a definition for "jazz", it is defined as something that is non-sensical, and that the dances performed to it are violent.

This is a great disservice to the musicians, and they are denied the respect that they should really have. Stemming from this, there are far- reaching parameters that define where the music should be played, which is generally in the smoky nightclub where alcohol is consumed, etc. It also dictates the economics, and how much one should earn. This is really a tragedy.

JM: In discussing the music with fellow fans, the feeling that I get is that they would prefer to go to the nightclub, rather than a venue such as Carnegie Hall.

YL: That is the established precedent. It's hard to break old habits. Some people think that's where the music should be. I don't, personally. It should never have been there.

JM: What would some of your solutions be for breaking down these parameters about the music which seem so entrenched in people's minds?

YL: Well, just by speaking out like I am now. I have found through experience that a lot of people use the term [jazz] because of environmental conditioning. They hear other people use it, and without questioning it, they start to use it not knowing what negative connotations there are attached to it.

JM: How do you feel about the music today, with the large number of very young players coming on the scene with a great amount of commercial backing? For instance, trumpeter Marlon Jordan, who is only 18 years old, already has a big record contract with a major label?

YL: Well, I'm not familiar with the person you just mentioned, but of course those musicians who contributed to this music culture before them, they made it possible for these younger players today.

JM: Do you feel that the older generation of musicians is being shut out, or forgotten about?

YL: No, but there is a problem with the way things are presented in this society. For example, this throw-away carton attitude. Like when Cannonball [Adderley] came on the scene they called him the new Charlie Parker, as though Charlie Parker didn't mean anything anymore.

When [Wynton] Marsalis came on the scene, some writers referred to him as the new Miles Davis, meaning that Miles Davis is finished. But Miles is still living and still contributing and he is still the dynamic personality.

This type of presentation is damaging. I don't know why we think in terms of the throw-away carton, that we don't need this anymore because something else is here now. I don't know why people do that, it's disrespectful.

JM: In order to improvise on the level that Black American music is played on, what inner abilities does one need?

YL: A depth of analytical skills are required. A certain technical proficiency, coupled with the ability to express one's sentiments. This last part is very vital, because you can listen to a lot of people and they will overwhelm you with their technical facility. But, at the same time, there is a lack of sentiments of those qualities that people are capable of expressing, such as compassion and love and deep feeling.

When one balances the two, then you have that unique kind of aesthetic. One has to train themselves to express their sentiments, otherwise it just becomes an apple made of wax.

JM: How do you train yourself to express these sentiments?

YL: Well, there are several ways to do it. One must be aware, for example, of the quality of love in their mother's expression. They should be able to hear the love in their mother's voice when their mother speaks to them.

They should recognize when they themselves are being compassionate to their family or neighbors. They should be keenly aware of this quality of existence. Once one develops that kind of quality, then they can express this in their music.

JM: How about sentiments unlike love and happiness, but along the lines of anger or depression?

YL: Yes, anger is a natural quality, but it has no place in aesthetics as I see it. Anger is something that should be controlled, because reasoning suffers when one is angry.

JM: So, is it not possible to "play angry"?

YL: Well, one might do it, but I don't think it's necessary. Are you associating dissonance with anger?

JM: I wouldn't associate the two, but it has been many times elsewhere. For instance, many of the reviews of John Coltrane's music late in his life were full of terms such as "anti-jazz", "unlistenable", "angry", and "non-sensical".

YL: John Coltrane was at my house in Teaneck about three weeks before he died. I was introducing him to a realtor as he was looking for a new house. I then left for England, and shortly after I was there I read the morning paper that he had passed. I knew him personally, and he was not an angry person. He was a very gentle and amiable person. I can't conceive of his music as being angry at all. Again this is a misrepresentation.

Often people don't know what they are listening to. Consequently, critics are frequently guilty of defining things incorrectly. I know this for a fact. Sometimes critics define an ABA song format as the blues, and other various mistakes. I wouldn't put too much faith in that, and I could never see John's music as being angry. He wasn't an angry individual, he was just the opposite.

JM: Is this another problem of environmental conditioning, that readers will take as gospel what critics say in their reviews?

YL: I would lean in that direction. Here is another example along those lines: Branford Marsalis gave a concert on this campus recently which I attended. I read a review in which the critic said some good things and some negative things. One thing he said was that the tone of Marsalis' saxophone was "not dirty like John Coltrane's". I thought that was very offensive.

So you see, people have different concepts, and that is part of America, the ability to speak out. But yet, you still shouldn't discredit people. If you don't like something, just pass on it, you don't have to cut it up.

(Editor's note — the reviewer who wrote the article on Branford Marsalis called to apologize for offending Mr. Lateef.)

Men's cross country to have a new look

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

Changes highlight the 1991 University of Massachusetts men's cross country team. The team lost its top four runners to graduation last spring and the success of this year's harrier squad will depend on how the returning runners step up and fill the vacancies left by the departure of Jon Corso, Tom Degnan, Gerry Squires and Joe Milette.

While youth and relative inexperience might prevent this year's cross country squad from duplicating its performance of last year, UMass head coach Ken O'Brien still expects the 1991 team to be competitive.

"I don't think we'll have a bad season," O'Brien said. "But we may have a bit of a roller coaster ride. We may have to suffer through some growing pains this year as some kids on our team who haven't had a lot of front-running experience will have to learn to carry the team more."

While short on experience, the team is not without talent. Seven letter winners return from last year's squad. These seven will be counted on to provide leadership for the team.

Captaining this year's team is senior Pat Ryan. O'Brien describes Ryan as "the ultimate team runner." He earned letters in his sophomore and junior years by consistently finishing among the team's top five runners. This past spring he won the 10,000-meter race at the Conference Championships.

The other lettermen returning are juniors Matt Simon, Mike Davis and Pat Reed and sophomores Craig Cormier, John Raach and Kevin Greenhalgh.

Simon had an outstanding high school career, gaining national recognition by running a 4:14 mile his senior year. During the 1990-91 track season, Simon qualified for every event in the New England Track Championships from the 1,000-meters to the 10,000. He capped his spring season by finishing third in the 3,000-meter steeplechase at New Englands.

Cormier showcased his talent from the start of his first collegiate season. In the team's first two meets, he finished third on the team. He continued to place among the team's top five runners throughout the season and capped the year by finishing 19th at the Atlantic 10 Championships. In the spring, he concluded his inaugural year with a third place finish in the 5,000-meter race at the Conference Championships.

O'Brien described Raach as "the surprise of the Minutemen's cross country and track teams last year." He finished among the top five Minutemen in each of his first two varsity races but struggled over the second half of the season, suffering through bouts with allergies and asthma. He came back in the spring to grab a medal in the 5,000-meters at the Conference Championships and qualified for the 10,000-meters at New Englands.

O'Brien expects Raach to be a big boost to this year's squad if he can remain healthy.

Greenhalgh is trying to rebound from an injury that plagued him during his freshman season. In high school, he was a two-time All-State runner in cross country. Although he was sidelined much of last year with a severe ankle injury and a series of illnesses, O'Brien calls Greenhalgh the team's most consistent trainer and expects him to be able to come back for a successful sophomore year.

Reed and Davis are two runners who have been in the shadows of others in the past but who O'Brien will look toward to step forward this year.

Reed has an outstanding range of ability, according to O'Brien, and can be competitive in races from the 800-meters to the 10,000-meters. Davis placed third in the 10,000-meters at the Conference meet last spring. O'Brien believes that he is just starting to mature as a collegiate distance runner.

According to O'Brien, the toughest task his team may face this season is not its own weaknesses, but the strengths of its opposition.

"Our schedule doesn't give the kids a chance to get their feet wet gradually," he said. "We don't have the luxury of playing ourselves into shape."

The Minutemen open their 1991 season with a tri-meet against Boston College, the third ranked team in New England a year ago and the University of Lowell. Other teams on the docket this season are UConn and Providence College, the top two teams in New England last year and currently ranked 13th and 15th respectively, in the NCAA Division 1 preseason poll.

Matt Simon and Mike Davis will be running fast and furious for UMass this season.

BEFORE TRUSTING YOUR FUTURE TO ANY COMPANY, ASK FOR SOME LETTERS OF REFERENCE.

You put more than just your savings into a retirement company. You put in your trust and hopes for the future, too. So before you choose one, ask some questions. How stable is the company? How solid are its investments? How sound is its overall financial health?

A good place to start looking for answers is in the ratings of independent analysts. Three companies, all widely recognized resources for finding out how strong a financial services company really is, gave TIAA their top grade.

IN THE FINAL ANALYSIS, TIAA IS LETTER-PERFECT.

TIAA received A+ from A.M. Best Co., AAA from Standard & Poor's and Aaa from Moody's Investors Service. These ratings reflect TIAA's reliable claims-paying ability, exceptional financial strength, superior investment performance, and low expenses. With its guaranteed rate of return and opportunity for dividends, TIAA is one of less than ten companies, out of 2,200 nationwide, that received these highest marks.

CREF. FOUR MORE LETTERS EVERYONE SHOULD KNOW.

For further growth potential and diversification, there's the CREF variable annuity with four different investment accounts to give you the flexibility you want as you save for the future.

Together, TIAA and CREF form the nation's largest private retirement system, with over $95 billion in assets and more than 70 years of experience serving the education community. For over one million people nationwide, the only letters to remember are TIAA-CREF.

Yamasaki.

"Shizuko is a senior and a good leader," Gentzler said. "She has been playing great and this is the best that I have seen her this early in the season. She should do a great job."

No. 2 on the singles team is co-captain Gail Girasella. She teams up with Kerensa Eddy to form the No. 1 doubles team.

"Gail has done a tremendous job at UMass," Gentzler said. "I have never seen her so eager for a season. The Girasella-Eddy team is fantastic. They have the potential to be nationally ranked."

Gentzler is banking on the return of sophomore Vannessa Xenapoulou, who is the No. 1 player in her home country of Cyprus. According to Gentzler, Xenapoulou was planning on transfering to North Carolina but did not.

"She is back," Gentzler said. "I haven't talked to her but I hope she returns to the team. She has the talent to be one of the best in the nation."

Also important to the team will be the play of Amy Ryan of Springfield, who is returning from a broken arm and Kerry Kaminski, who won nine straight matches last year.

"This may be our last season but this team is ready to play," he said. "I hope that the students come out to support their team and show the University that tennis deserves to be funded."

Tennis remains strong despite budget woes

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team the upcoming season almost never occurred. On May 17, 1991 word came down from the UMass Athletic Department that the team could no longer be funded. Simply stated, there would be no 1991 season.

However, the team was able to raise $5,000 from private sources and stay alive for one last season.

"It looked bleak at first, but the team worked hard to raise the money and the community responded in a very positive manner," said Coach Edwin Gentzler.

According to Gentzler, senior co-captain Sarah Nadowiny spearheaded the fund-raising drive by making phone calls, laying out plans and presenting the check to athletic director Frank McInerney.

"Sarah was the most instrumental in raising the money," Gentzler said. "She simply never gave up — this team owes her a lot for what she did."

The team also owes a lot to their coach. Gentzler took a 90 percent pay cut and still stuck with the program.

"Obviously I am not being paid well," Gentzler said. "But I am here out of loyalty to my team and a commitment to women's athletics."

So the team is still alive and, according to Gentzler, morale is not low as they enter this "terminal season."

"So far the attitude has been good," Gentzler said. "The team knows that this is their last chance to perform and people are staying positive."

One downside to the terminal season was the loss of two top recruits. One went to Temple on a scholarship and the other left for the University of Connecticut.

"It was tough to lose our blue-chip recruits but there was nothing we could do," Gentzler said.

As for those who will play for UMass this season, Gentzler is excited about the level of talent and experience returning.

"We have everyone back from last season and we are on the verge of being a good team. We were 4-6 last season and we lost a lot of close matches. We have a chance to win them all this season."

An undefeated season may or may not be possible, but UMass is returning some quality tennis players. The Minutewomen will be led by No. 1 singles player Shizuko

Sports

UMass sports on the rise

Welcome back to Western Massachusetts, the 51st state in the country, at least according to most Bostonians. See, if daily life doesn't get covered at all in the Boston newspapers, do you think our highly underrated sports teams do? Of course not! So all I have to say to every New England area college team is, "We'll take you all on anytime, anyplace!"

Seriously, I don't plan on getting my friends together and challenging the Boston University hockey team anytime soon, but the point is, most of UMass' sports teams can hold their own against any other college team in the New England area.

Let's begin, for example, with basketball. The Minutemen are definitely the best team in Massachusetts, and probably in N.E. For instance, we schooled Boston College in basketball last year, yet they were lucky enough to only lose by one point. Boston University, Northeastern, and Holy Cross rarely pose any threat to the hoop team.

The Connecticut Huskies would be a challenge, but they chickened out after we gave them a scare two years ago and will no longer play us. It doesn't matter, because the Minutemen will play them at the Eastern Regionals of the NCAAs this year and beat them.

With Eric Murdoch gone to the NBA, Providence is another team from N.E. that UMass can look down upon. Louis Roe leads the Minutemen recruiting class, which is rated as high as 15th by some scouts. Games against Kentucky and Oklahoma look to be the yardsticks to where the team measures up.

One suggestion to widen the visibility of the hoop team is this: hold a New England open basketball tournament at a neutral site (like the Boston Garden or the Springfield Civic Center for instance), and invite every Division 1 New England college team. Do you think people would pay to see teams like Boston College, UConn, Providence, and the Minutemen do battle?

Michael Morrissey

Moving on to football, which may be one of our more unknown teams, if only for the fact that they play in the Division I-AA Yankee Conference. The Minutemen (8-2-1) went to the playoffs last year, but were embarrassed by William & Mary, 38-0, in the first round. However, the Yankee Conference expands in 1993, which means UMass will be playing in the toughest league in Division I-AA.

Coach Jim Reid always gets the most out of his teams and this year will be no exception. Reid traditionally goes on recruiting trips with a packed lunch, in order to save the Athletic Department money. Coach Reid is also a close friend of Patriots coach Dick MacPherson.

UMass baseball and lacrosse are two spring teams on the rise. While Mike Stone's ballclub lost their three top players to the professional ranks after coming within one win of the NCAA regionals, the pitching staff remains intact and will only improve with another year under its belt. Maine remains UMass' toughest challenge in New England.

For a team ranked in the top 15 in the nation for most of the year, the UMass lacrosse team has received almost no recognition east of Interstate 495. However, the Gorillas have yet to climb over the hump and beat Syracuse. Yet in the famous words of Boston College's lax coach, whose team was crushed by UMass last year, "I didn't know they were that good."

The women athletes of UMass are also top notch and they will look forward to kicking Boston area teams surprised butts all over the field this year. The women's soccer and field hockey teams are two teams that definitely should be watched as they are always nationally ranked.

UMass softball speaks for itself. The Minutewomen took care of all of their Atlantic-10 competition, going 15-0 and becoming the first team in conference history to go undefeated. Look for another awesome season from them.

One last point: once the Mullins Arena is completed, I'll gladly watch our hockey team get smacked by B.C., Harvard, Maine, and B.U. for a few years while we work our way up.

Random thoughts: The most underrated player on the Red Sox this year has to be Carlos Quintana. All the guy's done is play Gold Glove-like defense, hit .300, and shown a flash or two of power. Talk about unappreciated! I wonder where he'd be right now if it was him instead of Mike Greenwell who beat Mo Vaughn with a bat.

Monday's sports headline: MacPherson Magic as Pats beat Browns. You've got to hate when such a brilliant, talented athlete like Randall Cunningham goes down for the year. I see Jim McMahon winning comeback player of the year.

One final note: When UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos went down last year with what turned out to be a broken vertebra in his spine, the fans at Delaware cheered and laughed. Delaware plays at UMass Saturday.

Fasano gets the nod at QB

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Tom Fasano will be taking the snaps from center Andy LeBlanc when the University of Massachusetts opens its season against the University of Delaware (Saturday, 1:30 p.m., McGuirk Alumni Stadium).

Fasano was unanimously selected by the UMass coaching staff to start at quarterback after he displayed more poise and consistency than his competitors during pre-season.

"Tom has been more consistent than all the other quarterbacks," UMass Coach Jim Reid said. "Tom may not be as fast as Tony Williams or have as good an arm as Paul Tornatore, but he's consistent, and right now that's what we're looking for."

The quarterback controversy surfaced when Dave McGovern could not practice in the spring because of various injuries. Reid said if McGovern had not been injured, he probably would have been the starting quarterback going into camp.

"Dave McGovern is just now getting back into form from his various injuries," Reid said.

Tony Williams is still trying to make the switch from cornerback to quarterback and while he creates excitement, he is erratic.

"Tony is the guy to watch in the future," Reid said. "He makes big plays — the problem is that he makes big plays for both teams."

Fasano took over at quarterback after Gary Wilkos broke a vertebra in his back. In his first start against Northeastern, he completed seven of 12 passes for 57 yards and a touchdown, while gaining 44 yards on 11 carries. In the next game at Richmond, Fasano broke his ankle in a non-contact, season-ending mishap.

"I'm not nervous," Fasano said. "I'm sure I'll have some butterflies before the game, but right now I'm just looking forward to my chance to start."

At UMass media day, each of the quarterbacks was asked about the competition and they all responded by saying that there really was no competition because they were helping each other out and they were all friends.

"Perhaps they were looking at it the wrong way," Reid said. "It was a competition. All I know is that Tom Fasano saw it as a competition."

Now, when you talk to Williams and McGovern, there is an obvious sense of disappointment. However, the disappointment that they show has not diminished their goals for the team.

"I'm a team player. If the coaches think it's the right decision, it's the right decision," Williams said. "We all had a good camp, Tom deserves it."

McGovern said, "Hopefully he'll do a great job and I won't have to go in."

"I'm glad it wasn't my decision," said tailback Jerome Bledsoe.

The legendary Bob Pickett is back

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Traditions are a big part of college football.

Legendary coaches are part of those traditions: "Bear" Bryant, Knute Rockne, Woody Hayes and Pop Warner to name a few.

The University of Massachusetts football team has its own share of tradition and legends. One of its legendary coaches is Bob Pickett.

And the legend is back. Pickett, UMass' head football coach from 1978 to 1983, returns to the gridiron as an assistant coach on defense in charge of the inside linebackers.

"When I played, Coach Pickett was talked about as a legend," former UMass player and now assistant Coach Joe Cullen said. "You heard about him, but didn't really know about him."

In 1964, Pickett was an assistant football coach at the University of Maine when he went to Medford to recruit a high school fullback, who turned out to be UMass head Coach Jim Reid. Reid played for three seasons at Maine under Pickett.

In 1972, Pickett became an assistant at UMass under head Coach Dick MacPherson. Following Reid's graduation from Maine, Pickett recommended Reid as a graduate assistant and MacPherson obliged.

When MacPherson left after the 1977 season, Pickett was named UMass' head football coach, with Reid as a full-time assistant. Reid stayed on for Pickett's six years as coach and the following two seasons under Bob Stull.

After Stull's term, Reid got the call to become the head coach.

Now Pickett is back as an assistant coach to Reid, a position Reid admits he is ecstatic about, but uncomfortable with.

"For me to sit in the same room as him and me to be the head coach and him to be the assistant coach is wrong," Reid said. "When I found out that he wanted to coach, I asked him if he wanted to be the head coach. I find myself saying in practice, Coach Pickett, you do this, unless you don't want to, you don't have to."

During Pickett's tenure as head coach, his teams amassed a 36-28 record. Four of the six teams either won or shared the Yankee Conference championship. His 1978 team is the only UMass team to win the Lambert Cup, awarded to the top team in the East. That team was also the national runner-up in the NCAA I-AA playoffs.

After Pickett left coaching, he stayed at UMass as the assistant to the Dean of Physical Education for Planning. He has been instrumental in the planning of Mullins Arena.

He has been working with all facets of the UMass squad. He has been involved with game preparation, defensive alignment and was named by Reid as his recruiting coordinator.

Pickett has noticed some differences in the game since he coached eight years ago, such as a more wide open passing game, but, "it's still blocking and tackling."

"He's been a great inspiration to the team," Cullen said. "His leadership qualities and his knowledge of the game helps out the team as a whole."

Pickett was asked by the athletic administration to return to coaching after several coaches resigned.

"It wasn't a difficult decision [to return to coaching], because of the people I was going to work with," Pickett said. "I feel very good about coaching. The bottom line is that I really enjoy it."

"The fire never dies," said Reid.

Kremlin falls as Soviet Union disintegrates

By ANN IMSE
Associated Press

MOSCOW —In a dramatic break with seven decades of iron-fisted Kremlin rule, lawmakers on Thursday approved the creation of an interim government to usher in a new confederation of sovereign states and put a graceful end to the disinteg.ating Soviet Union.

After three days of stormy debate and intense back-room negotiating, the 1,900-member Congress of People's Deputies declared a transition period to a "new system of state relations."

The measure they approved envisions a voluntary union based on independence and territorial integrity for the republics, and enshrines democracy and human rights.

President Mikhail Gorbachev praised the lawmakers, saying they "rose to the occasion" at a crucial juncture in Soviet history.

"Tremendous renewal has certainly taken place," he told the Tass news agency later.

"The Soviet Union is finished," reformist lawmaker Arkady Murashov told reporters.

The upheaval even threatened to sweep away Vladimir Lenin, the founder of the Soviet state and Communism's most sacred symbol. Before the Congress adjourned, Leningrad's reformist mayor, Anatoly Sobchak, proposed removing Lenin's body from its stately mausoleum in Red Square.

The Congress effectively put itself out of business by approving the restructuring plan, so the fate of Lenin is to be taken up later by a new and smaller legislature.

The lawmakers' overwhelming endorsement of Gorbachev's restructuring plan capped three weeks of dizzying change that began with a coup by hard-liners and triggered the collapse of central authority and the Communist Party.

All but five of the 15 Soviet republics have declared independence, and Gorbachev was poised to formally recognize the first of them — the three Baltic states. He said he and his new State Council would act Friday on Baltic independence.

Gorbachev dominated the huge and raucous parliament, squelching debate and refusing to accept proposals from the chamber.

"I will not yield the microphone to anyone from the floor!" he said as some deputies tried to speak. "Either make a decision or not. That's all!"

After Wednesday's session, Gorbachev sent lawmakers into caucuses, where they were subjected to arm-twisting by republic leaders who had helped put together the plan.

The Congress endorsed the plan by a lopsided 1,682-43 vote. When the tally came up, Gorbachev nodded and clapped, and Russian President Boris Yeltsin, seated next to him, smiled broadly.

The plan was fashioned by Gorbachev and the leaders of 10 republics including Yeltsin, who emerged as his governing partner after leading nationwide resistance to last month's abortive coup.

"We've said all along, as long as they continue on the reform path in both economics and politics, as long as they arrive at decisions in a peaceful manner that's mutually acceptable to the center and the republics, the final outcome is something that they have to decide for themselves," said deputy White House press secretary Roman Popadiuk.

The new Soviet defense minister, Gen. Yevgeny Shaposhnikov, told a news conference on Thursday that the country's nuclear weapons are under secure control.

Shaposhnikov also said he would hold talks with representatives of all republics on the status of Soviet troops on their territory.

Congress agreed on rapid moves toward a market economy, including the right to own property, and passed a sweeping human rights declaration.

Posted flyers outrage campus community

By AHVA DAVIS
Collegian Staff

University administrators are outraged at the appearance of flyers around campus threatening to hold "Hillel and the Jewish community responsible" for any aggression towards a City University of New York professor who made remarks this summer that some have deemed anti-Semitic.

The flyer names Leonard Jeffries Jr., chairperson of the Department of Black Studies at CUNY, who during a state-sponsored conference on July 20, said Hollywood is controlled by Jewish filmmakers who conspired with their Mafia backers to destroy Blacks.

Jeffries also attacked "rich Jews" who he said financed the slave trade in the United States and Europe.

He is quoted as saying "Russian Jewry had a particular control over the movies."

He also said during the speech that "their financial partners, the Mafia, put together a financial system of destruction of Black people."

Top New York officials, including Gov. Mario Cuomo, have condemned Jeffries' speech and have called for his resignation.

The photocopied flyer at UMass was posted on the concourse level of the Student Union and Campus Center sometime early this week. Administrators do not know who posted the unsigned flyer.

Although Jeffries has lectured at UMass and other area schools in the past, it is unknown if he has scheduled any speeches in the area this semester.

According to published reports, CUNY intends to examine Jeffries' actions and statement and if warranted, pursue a course of action against the tenured professor.

Campus officials were angered by the appearance of the anonymous poster.

Home Ec. Dept. gets new name, image, structure

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Armed with a new name and structure, the department of consumer studies at the University has revamped its image to increase the visibility and improve the recognition of the previously named home economics department.

On August 7, the Board of Trustees approved a name change to the department of consumer studies. The department has been divided into the two majors of apparel marketing and family and consumer sciences.

"We have had difficulty having people understand what we do" with a name like home economics, said Professor Penny A. Ralston, the head of the department.

The new title and structure "makes our focus very clear" but, Ralston added, "we have been doing these things throughout the years. Now, we're trying to bring attention to the program."

According to Ralston, the focus of the multidisciplinary department of consumer studies is "for the consumers both in the marketplace and in the household."

Students may study not only the business and marketing angle of fashion marketing, for example, but also the human side of people through the study of family and community services.

Sheila Mammen is the coordinator of the consumer and family sciences major within the department. She believes the updated and refocused department is "an accurate reflection of what we do in the department."

"The original name of home economics did not clearly reflect what we did," Mammen said.

The revitalized department will have more visibility, Mammen said, and will make students in the department more marketable since they will possess the needed business skills to compete in the workplace.

To apparel marketing lecturer John Donnellan, the old

Student's pet tarantula sparks trouble

UMass ejects unwelcomed, hairy arachnid from dorm

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

Students in the Northeast Residence Area are up in arms — and legs — over the loss of Creep, famed pet tarantula of the fourth floor of Dwight.

Unaware of the University pet policy, freshman Marcus Barrows brought his 6-year-old Mexican Red-leg tarantula to school. While the official policy prohibits any pet besides fish, the residents of Dwight would like it otherwise.

"I think that they should really loosen up on their pet rules," said sophomore Dwight dweller Nicole Swain.

The tarantula's owner said the black and orange hairy creature is a bit scary at the first sight, but everyone on the hall quickly adjusted to cohabitation with the venomous Creep.

"Every one on this floor — or close to it —

State plans trade seminars

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Fresh from a trade mission to the Far East, Gov. William F. Weld said Thursday the state will hold a series of seminars to help Massachusetts companies tap into the world market.

Weld said the programs, called "Partners for Trade," would be geared toward the 70 percent of businesses that have little or no export experience.

The $90,000 program will be financed with $30,000 from the state and a $60,000 Small Business Administration grant.

"Recent business history has shown that exporting represents a significant growth opportunity for Massachusetts companies," Weld said. "Many businesses that achieved significant expansion over the last year did so either by starting to export or by expanding existing export operations."

Weld returned Wednesday from a trade mission to Japan, Taiwan, Korea and China and Hong Kong.

The program will be offered next month in Springfield, in north-central Massachusetts and in southeastern Massachusetts. It also will be offered in other sections of the state through early spring.

Weld said the trade mission showed there was a market for computer software and biomedical technology, among other Massachusetts-made products, the the Pacific Rim countries.

Weld said the trade mission was a successful start to expanding opportunities for Massachusetts products, but "the consensus is that Massachusetts is quite a bit behind the curve" in its promotion of cross trade with the Pacific Rim.

For example, Weld said, Masssachusetts was the 26th state to to sign a trade agreement in Korea.

Survey: 9 out of 10 satisfied with UM

But 60 percent say students are treated 'like numbers'

By JASON GEORGE

More than nine out of ten students say they were "satisfied" or "very satisfied" with their experiences at the University of Massachusetts, according to a recently published University survey.

The Cycles Survey, administered for the past 16 years at UMass by the Student Affairs Research, Information, and Systems Office, is an annual project measuring student opinions and attitudes about their academic and social experiences on campus.

Although 94.9 percent of the 702 students interviewed reported they were "satisfied" with their lives at the University, approximately 60 percent agreed to some extent that "most students at UMass are treated like numbers, not people."

Over 49 percent of those responding agreed "administrators at UMass do not seem to care about students."

More than 14 percent of the students report that they personally experienced at least one form of harassment during the past year, and more than one-third report witnessing at least one form of harassment.

Elizabeth Williams, a graduate research assistant who wrote the report, said the study allows the administration and the Student Affairs office to "chart trends" of student's perceptions of the University and to act according to those trends.

Students were also asked about their level of satisfaction with various campus services, including food services, University Health Services and campus security.

Despite the fact only 4.4 percent of students reported they were "very satisfied" with the Dining Commons, approximately one-half said they were "satisfied" with food services.

Nearly 80 percent of students said they were "satisfied" or "very satisfied" with University Health Services, while 85 percent said they were satisfied by the level of safety on campus.

Due to budget cuts, the Cycles Survey has been conducted by phone for the past two years. Although the telephone survey is much less expensive than the previous mail-out questionnaire, the new system makes it difficult to compare results from past years, Williams said.

"We can't compare these results with old results," Williams said. "We're using a different methodology, and that's the reason we don't make comparisons with the past years.

"The phone survey provides better, more accurate results," Williams said. "There are more people that we don't reach [by mail]. You have to be motivated to return a letter."

The survey results conclude that the "overall picture that emerges. . . is one of high levels of satisfaction" over most aspects of University life, despite some "problem areas deserving attention from the University community."

If those problems are addressed, according to the report, "the overall experience of the vast majority of undergraduates. . . should be truly satisfactory."

Rosh Hashana a time of self-reflection and celebration

By FELICE COHEN
Collegian Staff

When the sun sets this Sunday evening, Jews all over the world will begin celebration of Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, one of the holiest of Jewish holidays.

Rosh Hashana, a two-day holiday, begins a 10-day period known as T'Shuva, meaning "to return," a time of self evaluation and also a celebration of another year.

University of Massachusetts Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter said Rosh Hashana is a time for Jews not just to ask for forgiveness of each other and themselves, but to try to change their actions and to clear away what might be getting in the way of better relationships.

"Not just "I'm sorry," but we look for a more positive way to act," he said.

On the first day of Rosh Hashana, most observant Jews do not go to work or to school. Instead, "Rosh Hashana is an opportunity to step back from the day to day pressures of our lives and to take a close look at the reason for our being," said Perlmutter. "To ask what's it all for? And where are we going?"

What makes Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement, so unique from other Jewish holy days is that "[Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur] focus on the individual and where they are going on their lives. It does not commemorate some past Jewish event like Chanukah and Passover," Perlmutter said.

"We're individuals who come together in a community to stand before each other and God and to ask ourselves where we are headed in our lives and where we would like to go," he added.

During Rosh Hashana there is a special custom conducted called "Tashlich," meaning "casting" or "throwing."

Jews go to a body of flowing water and read from different biblical selections about casting their sins upon the water. They then take a stone or bread crumbs and, symbolizing those objects as the parts of themselves that they would like to throw away, they cast them into the water.

"There are so many verbal prayers that we try to do a physical act to become more involved," said Perlmutter.

During this time Jews wish each other a "Shana Tova Umituka," meaning "a good and sweet year." And to symbolize this they eat cut-up apples dipped in honey.

Another custom is the blowing of the "shofar," the ram's horn. Perlmutter said the shofar "acts as a moral alarm clock. Hearing the piercing sound is very powerful. It helps us to wake up and see where we are going."

Rabbi Sheila Weinberg, of the Jewish Community of Amherst synagogue, said "Rosh Hashana is a time to come back to our truer selves and to ask who we are."

"It is a celebration of the world. It is a joyous holy day, but a serious one, too," she said.

Rosh Hashana services will be held in the Student Union Ballroom. They will begin on Sunday, Sept. 8 at 7 p.m. On Monday, Sept. 9, there is a 10 a.m. service and Tashlich, and again that evening a 7 p.m. service and kiddush. On Tuesday, Sept. 10 there is a 10 a.m. service.

Student voice-mail malfunctioning; possible fix seen

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts administrators are grappling with a problem with the student phone mail system which has caused the two-year-old system to shut down due to the "shear volume of calls."

The phone mail system for students in the residence halls began failing shortly after the move-in days when students began "initializing" their phone mail boxes and began calling friends to leave messages, said Philip P. Pelletier, an official in the Telecommunications Office.

There were few problems with the system last year when fewer students accessed the system. Now all students receive voice-mail when they pay the telecommunications fee.

Pelletier said his office is "desperately trying to fix" the student phone mail system which is "simply overloaded." He said there is a "glut" of student messages on the voice mail system.

He said officials upgraded the system over the summer and it was believed that there was sufficient capacity for all 6,000 voice mailboxes.

"We had no idea it was going to be this bad," he said. "We asked other colleges what to do [when all students are placed on the phone mail system]. And we planned for it but we did not plan for the shear volume of calls."

Pelletier said the problem first came to his attention early Thursday after University telephone operators began receiving complaints from students.

"I sympathize with the kids," he said. "It's a service and we plan to fix it as soon as possible."

Pelletier said he is conducting a phone "traffic study" Thursday night to pinpoint the bottlenecks in the system. He hopes to implement a solution to the system Friday morning.

The academic side of the voice-mail system for offices, faculty and administrators was unaffected by the overload, Pelletier said.

Auto insurance rate hearings open in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Rising bodily injury claims forced the auto insurance industry to seek an 11.8 percent increase in 1992 premiums in Massachusetts, an industry official told the Insurance Division on Thursday.

Daniel Johnston, president of the Automobile Insurers Bureau of Massachusetts, testified as the division began its hearings on the 1992 rate request, which would boost bills by about $90 a car on average.

Assistant Attorney General Ernest L. Sarason Jr., testifying on behalf of Attorney General Scott L. Harshbarger, said the increase would drive total insurance premiums up by nearly $300 million.

"The attorney general believes that the full rate increase proposed by the insurance industry is not supportable and is excessive," Sarason said.

The attorney general's office will submit a formal rate recommendation later on in the hearing process, as will actuaries for the Insurance Division.

Consumer Affairs Secretary Gloria Larson urges Insurance Commissioner Kay Doughty to force the industry to justify every dollar it is spending and not to use this year's rates as the starting point for determining next year's.

Larson called her approach "zero-based rate setting." She said it meant starting hearings "without a presumption that next year's rates will automatically be higher."

But Larson said some increase may be justified after all the evidence is reviewed by Doughty.

Johnston said the rate request represents an overall decrease of 4 percent for coverages that pay for repairing damaged cars, but a nearly 28 percent increase in costs of coverage that pay for caring for injured people.

Johnston said an overhaul of the personal injury system is beyond the scope of the Insurance Division, but would require new legislation.

But, he said, certain groups of lawyers and health care providers would fight changes.

Johnston also argued that an analysis of past rate cases show that the industry's projections of future claims experience were more accurate than either those of the attorney speech while threatening a community is totally inappropriate," said UMass Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

Assistant Dean of Academic Support Services Ricardo Townes said that Jeffries is "a good lecturer who talks about Afro-centric values."

"Leonard Jeffries has been on campus and has a large following," said Townes.

Townes said although Jeffries is a good lecturer "those comments aren't acceptable."

Officials do not know how many of the flyers were posted.

The flyer read: "Notice: Third World Affairs and the Black Community will hold the Hillel and the Jewish people responsible for any threats, mis-quotes, slander or acts of violence against Dr. Leonard Jeffries, Jr., chair, department of Black Studies. Freedom of speech is the law."

The words "Third World Affairs" appears to have been pasted from an issue of the Collegian. Editor-in-Chief Gayle Long said no Collegian staff members have any connection with the flyer.

"The Collegian and the staff had no previous knowledge or connection with the flyer," she said. "The staff, including members of the Third World Affairs desk, are outraged and upset about this flyer."

Grant Ingle, director of the Office of Human Relations, said that he was "concerned about reverberations on campus between the black and Jewish communities."

has held it," said Barrows.

A petition has been circulating to allow Creep to remain on the floor. Over 90 students have signed, mostly from Dwight and its surrounding dorms.

Gerald Siu, Barrows' roommate, said he was initially "a bit afraid," but added, "It's not a problem, because it doesn't move — it just sits there.

The wire cover to the tank which Creep calls home is secured by a five-pound weight, and is checked daily by Barrows.

The room of this 10-legged, eight-eyed animal, sometimes mistaken as a spider, is marked by a sign hung on the door which reads, "Dwight 4th Floor, Home of the original 'Creep'"

While students appeal to higher authorities to bring Creep back to the dorm, the carnivorous, cricket-eating insect will move off-campus, although newcomers at the University are seldom allowed that freedom.

Normally, much paperwork is necessary to move out of the dorms in the first year, but Dwight's resident director, Cindy Gallagher, simply ordered Creep's deportation. Barrows decided to obey the order and sent his pet to visit with a local pastor "for a week or two as we petition this."

Asked about the possible repercussions, Associate Housing Director Larry Moneta said, "We would file charges and let the judicial system find the appropriate outcome."

Barrows, a pre-veterinary major, insists Creep has "never bitten a soul."

"It does have venom, but it will only affect you if you are allergic to it. . . not that it would bite," he said.

Karen Tamms, a freshman Stockbridge student, added her voice to many others in support of Creep the tarantula: "We like him and we want him to stay."

Intentionally setting rates as too low has left us with market disorder," he said. "It has left us with a mass exodus of insurance companies who have chosen to no longer do business in Massachusetts."

City of Chelsea bankrupt

By the Associated Press

CHELSEA — A gloomy rain fell Thursday as residents of this impoverished city next to Boston waited to see whether the state would come through with the money needed to stay in business.

Mayor John Brennan, whose weariness with the job led him to decide against seeking re-election this year, said city employees received paychecks on Wednesday, but without state action, there wouldn't be any more.

"We're at a waiting game here," said Brennan, who has pushed for state receivership for months.

"Chelsea is at a halt. We have no money for September."

Gov. William F. Weld announced legislation that would put the city under a receivership for up to five years with broad economic power, short of raising taxes. He urged the Legislature to pass the bill in the next two days.

"We've got to win this one...some reasonably radical steps may be required," the Republican governor said. The appointment of a receiver apparently would be the first time such a drastic step had been taken in Massachusetts.

Nevertheless, some residents were anything but optimistic.

"It's not going to change. Chelsea's always been the armpit of the universe," said unemployed Frank Morris, 42, who has lived here all his life. "Maybe they should sell the schools and turn them into condominiums."

A bartender at the Grub's Pub, serving about 10 patrons at the bar under a sign reading "Due to bank changes beyond our control, 2 percent charge on all checks cashed," agreed.

"I've lived here 24 years, and I can't see any change yet," said the woman who would not give her name.

The situation worsened Wednesday night when a finance control board rejected a $3.4 million short-term budget for Chelsea, leaving the city with no authority to spend money or pay bills.

Budget woes continue

Veto override puts budget $65M in red

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld said Thursday the Legislature threw the fiscal year 1992 budget $65 million out of balance by overriding his veto of money for state employee health insurance costs.

Weld said he would use his legal authority to impound the $65 million and force the Group Insurance Commission, which oversees the state employee health plan, to cut benefits and raise co-payments to make up the difference.

The House and Senate overturned the veto overwhelmingly on Wednesday.

Democrats are solidly in control in the House, but Weld has a sufficient minority in the Senate to sustain a veto, providing they stick with him.

The Senate override vote was unanimous, although two Republicans and one Democrat initially indicated they would vote with Weld. They paired their anti-override votes with absent senators when it became clear it would have made no difference if they had been formally recorded.

It takes a two-thirds vote to override a veto. There are currently 38 senators, since there are two vacancies in the 40-member chamber.

Weld vetoed $376 million in money for state employee health costs after the Legislature refused to go along with his plan to raise employee premium contributions to 25 percent from the current 10 percent.

Weld contended the budget failed to provide full funding for the line item program at the 90-10 level. And Democratic leaders did not dispute the point.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Mysticism or just plain luck? Read and decide for yourself.

Elizabeth Stringer

My first week back at UMass should be recorded in the next volume of that Time-Life series on the mystic. Have you seen the commercial? Or heard about it?

It goes something like this:

In Reckoniwill, Texas, Jane Doe burns the roof of her mouth on a french fry. Three million miles away, in Geeitscold, Alaska, her sister, June Doe, from whom she was separated at birth, bites her tongue.

DISMISSED AS: COINCIDENCE.

Coincidence? No way. The facts are laid out on the table as far as I'm concerned. I'm a believer, and that is really weird.

Now, my friends will tell you that I say and think that absolutely everything that happens is weird. However, I know that something strange is happening at UMass. We are involved in some kind of strange Twilight Zone thing.

What you are about to hear is not pretty. Please brace yourselves.

Fact number one: I arrived in my new dorm to find that a very good friend of mine from my floor last year had been placed in the room directly to my left. Amazing. To add to the bizarreness, her best friend, whom she had roomed with, shared the same name as my favorite character from Peter Pan. (I'll give you a hint. It wasn't Peter or Tinkerbell.)

DISMISSED AS: COINCIDENCE.

Fact number two: I got into the first class I wanted on add/drop day. Is this amazing or what? This one has to be the weirdest of them all.

DISMISSED AS: LUCKY.

Fact number three: I sat through more than half of French business class (French 475) before I realized that it was probably not Women's Studies 187. O.K., I'm not an idiot, but I just figured I didn't know much about what was going on because I had just added the course the day before. Besides, they didn't start speaking fluent French until the last 10 minutes of the class.

DISMISSED AS: FREAK INCIDENT.

Fact number four: In getting to know my roommate, I discovered that we were born on the exact same day, in the exact same month, in the exact same year. How did we end up rooming together? Is it all part of some psychology department experiment?

DISMISSED AS: CHANCE.

Fact number five: I discovered when I unpacked that I had forgotten two items vital to my life at UMass — my schedule and my ID. Now why would I do that, unless I purposely wanted to miss the first few days of classes? Me? Nahhhhh.

DISMISSED AS: PURELY ACCIDENTAL. (That's for the benefit of my professors, who may recognize my name on their class rosters.)

O.K., decide for yourself. But somehow I have to believe that something is going on here. O.K., maybe it just has something to do with the re-adjustment thing. You know, getting used to your new room. New roommate, even. The food. Yes, come to think of it, D.C. food could have something to do with my altered thinking.

Anyway, (and I should add in all seriousness for everyone that thinks that I'm a complete airhead) my first week back was eventful. No, it didn't go smoothly at times. Just remember, to all of you that had a week even close to, or perhaps worse than mine, it gets better.

A review of the off-Broadway comedy, "Moscow nights"

Hussein Ibish

The curtain rises. Millions watch enthralled as expert players on the stage of history posture and pose before the mighty lens of CNN. The production is flawless. The unwitting support cast, who haven't even been shown the script, play their parts to the hilt, first act in Crimea, second act in Moscow. Even the props obey the director's commands to a tee, as he leaps upon a convienient tank to roar and declaim.

Meanwhile somewhere in the bowels of the Kremlin, the patsies ("plotters") come to the quick realization that they are neither the authors nor producers of the real extravaganza power grab. They are bit players, front men, red herrings that obscure the real action until the surprise twist ending. What a performance!

But why have so many who ought to know better unquestioningly accepted as genuine this Brechtian drama that forgrounded its own artificiality? Who on earth, let alone the KGB, begins a coup d'etat on Monday morning, as everyone returns to the city and to their offices? Every rule of coup d'etat, and common sense for that matter, was violated. Except for detaining silly Gorby, not a single necessary action of coup d'etat was carried out. How, some may well ask, could Boris Yeltsin, in the middle of the so-called coup, fly into Moscow airport from Kazakhstan, drive through the city to the "White House," organize the Parliment, and orate from atop a supposedly hostile tank without being arrested or shot?

Isn't it interesting that the net effect of a supposed communist/KGB coup was the final dissolution of communist/federal authority? I suggest that the KGB is staffed by, among others, professional plotters and coup experts of the highest level, who would usually be able to get what they want. Perhaps, in a state in which nationalism had throughly replaced communism as popular ideology at all levels, including within the KGB, the consolidation of power in Moscow as capital of the resurgent Russian motherland was exactly that.

Could Yeltsin and the Russian nationalist/chauvinists have scripted a more ideal scenario for their purposes? Could it be that they did? It strains my credulity less than the histrionics that we have been asked to accept at face value. The problem is that everything that is known about pre-production, backstage activity, and post-production undermines the staged action to the point of singular dubiousness.

As time passes the facade is being slowly dropped, as Boris boasted to CNN a few days ago that it was he who had "tricked" the "plotters" to go to the Crimea. I believe the phrase is "set-up."

It actually doesn't matter whether Yeltsin and Co. initiated the scheme or just managed and manipulated it. The point is that rather than democracy and people power, as Americans will shortly realize, they are faced with an invigorated, ambitious and chauvinistic Russian state with strong proto-facist tendencies. The shadow of history looms large.

In spite of the unfathomable reputation that Mr. Yeltsin enjoys in the West as a kind of Swedish democrat, his demagoguery, apparent megelomania, probable paranoia, and open chauvinism give him all the hallmarks of a classic fascist leader. The most "Russian" of politicians in many ways, who better to rule the resurgent Russian motherland? He certainly seems to embody its authoritarianism, self-absorbtion, and vaunting ambition.

The resurgence of the ultra-nationalist pan-Russian hegemon clearly suggests the strong potential for civil war in the former USSR. Within hours of the power grab, the reborn Russian state claimed effective possession and control of all the missile systems, made thinly veiled hints at territorial aggrandizement, declared itself the protector of "order" and "stability" (obvious code words), and generally assumed hegemonic control of the republics, nominal independence notwithstanding.

Those who see in the Yugoslav conflict the future of the ex-USSR, may be more prophetic than they would wish as they herald "the return of war" to Europe. Yugoslav chaos may presage a continental chaos. The re-emergence of the pan-Russian state and its consolidation as a hegemonic power mandates the rearming of the also newly reborn pan-German state, and a return to the traditional relationship between the two great European land powers.

And that's when the fun really begins. . .

Well, it's your New World Order, and you wanted it.

Appreciate UMass

When I decided to write for the Editorial page, I already knew what I wanted to write about. Experts always tell us to write about what we know and care about. For a while, I have wanted to write about UMass. Somehow, I must convey how much I love it. Perhaps you will realize how unappreciated it is.

What is UMass anyway? Obviously, it means a lot of different things to a lot of people.

It's ducks, yellow daffodils and the lights of the 26-story library reflected on the pond at night. It's someone's blue Schwinn leaning against the side of the Student Union or the sound of skateboards scraping against the concrete of the Fine Arts Center. It's skydivers. A burnt french fry. Mountains.

UMass is "crunchy." It's basics, Queer Nation and candlelight vigils. Do you realize that UMass is the home of over 400 clubs and activities? If that is not enough, with 10 sympathetic friends and a signature, you can start the next one. That means if you and 10 friends happen to be 11 denture-wearing dishwashers named Dennis, you can start your own support group.

At UMass, you can major in the American tradition in folk dance. You may not get a job but, honestly, you can. I know someone that did.

UMass is red baseball hats with Greek letters, too. It's Guy Glodis, pink triangles and a gold cross.

And yes, UMass is even a public university in the midst of Gov. William F. Weld and a recession. It's add/drop lines, budget cuts and overstuffed lecture halls. Bad food, noisy dorms and late busses are part of UMass, too. So is a general acceptance of those who complain and act out against budget cuts and bad food.

UMass is alive. It's full of sadness, truth, color and fact. Like any living thing, it's replete with error, even fatal error, which we will not excuse away.

Yet, isn't it a greater shame to excuse away what can be the best years of our lives because of something as natural as faultiness? In three years are we going to remember that in 1991 student government collapsed? Of course not. We're going to remember the ordinary stuff that nobody notices like ducks, daffodils and mountains.

Zeppelin tribute band: the song and look remain the same

By PAUL DEGEORGES
Collegian Staff

Remember when you were about ten years old and they kept showing those ads for Beatlemania on TV in every commercial break? If you were like me, you thought to yourself: "Wow that's really neat!" Then as you aged and started becoming a music snob, you began to have your doubts. "How can they get away with that? Why don't they write their own music? Aren't there laws against this sort of stuff? Why not just see the real thing?"

Now you're around twenty-something, and instead of interrupting your afternoon Gilligan's Island fix, they saturate you in every Arts Calendar with ads for cover bands. If you're like me, you're probably still thinking to yourself..."Why not just see the real thing?"

Physical Graffiti has the answer: you can't see the real thing because Led Zeppelin isn't around anymore, but thanks to four incredibly talented musicians, you can relive the experience of a "Zep" show (or, if you weren't fortunate enough to be a teenager in the seventies, finally see what you missed).

In fact, Physical Graffiti is so good at pulling off a Led Zeppelin performance, the term "cover band" has literally been redefined by them. Now referred to as a "tribute band," Physical Graffiti boldly proclaim themselves as "The Ultimate Led Zeppelin Show." From assuming the names of the four original members right down to dressing in exact replicas of the clothes they wore, Gary J. Fox (John Paul Jones), Doug Putnam (Robert Plant), Matthew Hetherman (Jimmy Page) and John Mac (John Bonham) do a darn convincing job of reproducing a Led Zeppelin show.

Drummer John Mac says, "I'm even eating 25 bananas a day to recreate the Bonham paunch."

It's true that these guys are the spitting image of the real thing, and do sound pretty darn close to an actual "Zep" show, but one wonders — how can you possibly see Physical Graffiti and not be constantly thinking, "wow, these guys do a pretty good Led Zeppelin impersonation, but it's just not the real thing."

Well, I don't know because I'm sure I couldn't do it either. The fact remains however, that Led Zeppelin had some pretty amazing songs and were meant to be seen live. But John Bonham is dead, Robert Plant is a stubborn old man and won't do a reunion of the remaining members and so your chances of ever seeing the real thing are pretty darn slim, don't ya think?

Physical Graffiti is a must for true Zep-heads because they do the band justice and really are a "tribute". For anyone else, they are probably worth checking out just to hear a few Zep tunes louder than your stereo could ever think of playing, but then again, you might just want to wait for Beatlemania 2.

Physical Graffiti will play an 18 and over show at Katina's tonight at 10 p.m.

Book signing by local author

On Saturday, September 7 from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. a reading and book-signing by local author Patricia MacLachlan will take place at the Broadside Bookshop. Author of the Newbery award-winning Sarah, Plain and Tall, MacLachlan will be reading from and signing her two new children's books Journey and Three Names. The illustrator of Three Names, Alexander Pertzoff, a local artist, will also be available for book-signing.

Journey, published by Delacorte Press, is a moving account of an 11 year-old boy coming to terms with being abandoned by his mother, and his attempts to rediscover his own sense of family. This powerful story about family connections has been described as "a spellbinding tale" and "a full and refreshing work".

MacLachlan's picture book, Three Names, is a turn of the century tale told by a young boy who recalls his grandfather's stories about his own boyhood, and his dog "Three Names." The book "artfully weaves into a seamless whole both the old man's tales of his childhood and memories the narrator has of him telling them," says Publisher's Weekly. Pertzoff's art is described as "clean designs and dreamy watercolors."

MacLachlan, who has written several other children's books was given the Kite Award for Fiction in 1980 for her story Arthur, For the Very First Time, and won the Newbery award in 1986.

She is a graduate of the University of Connecticut and lives with her husband in Williamsburg.

Alexander Pertzoff is a Northampton based free-lance artist whose work has been exhibited in many galleries.

Congressman told China will cut aid to Khmer Rouge rebels

By KATHY WILHELM
Associated Press

BEIJING —A visiting American congressman said today that Chinese officials have indicated they will cut off all aid to the notorious Khmer Rouge rebels once a Cambodian peace plan is enacted.

Also today, the Beijing government accused three other American members of Congress of breaking the law a day earlier when they held up a banner and laid flowers at Tiananmen Square to honor 1989's slain democracy activists.

"This was a premeditated anti-Chinese farce, which could only arouse great indignation from the Chinese people," Foreign Ministry spokesman Wu Jianmin said during a regularly scheduled weekly briefing.

U.S. Reps. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., Ben Jones, D-Ga., and John Miller, R-Wash, were confronted by guards on Wednesday but not detained.

They left the country today as scheduled.

Regarding Cambodia, U.S. Rep. Stephen J. Solarz said today Chinese officials told him "they would cut off all assistance" to the Khmer Rouge when a comprehensive peace settlement in the Cambodian conflict is implemented.

The unidentified Chinese officials said Beijing would direct all aid to a newly established body that represents all Cambodian factions, said Solarz, a New York Democrat who chairs the House Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs. He spoke after meeting with Chinese officials over several days.

China has said publicly that it would stop military aid to the Khmer Rouge as part of a settlement, but has not previously mentioned non-military support.

The Chinese are the main backers of the Khmer Rouge guerillas, who killed hundreds of thousands of Cambodians when they ruled the nation 1975-1978.

Fear of return to power by the Communist Khmer Rouge has been one of the key problems in negotiating an end to the conflict.

The rebels and two U.S.-supported, non-Communist guerilla groups are battling a Vietnamese-installed government in Pnom Penn.

US to use Kuwaiti bases, train emirate's army

By DONNA ABU-NASR
Associated Press

KUWAIT CITY — Kuwait has agreed to a 10-year defense pact with the United States that will allow the Pentagon to use Kuwaiti bases and stockpile military hardware in the emirate.

The agreement, endorsed by Kuwait on Wednesday, also aims to achieve "close cooperation between the two countries to boost the military capabilities of the Kuwaiti armed forces through programs and training," said Dhari al-Othman, minister of state for Cabinet affairs.

The United States has repeatedly moved back its plans to withdraw from Kuwait the last contingent of troops sent to the region to drive Iraqi forces from Kuwait.

In Washington, a senior Bush administration official confirmed Wednesday that the defense agreement had been under negotiation but said formal notification of its acceptance hadn't yet reached Washington.

The Pentagon announced last week that the Bush administration was seeking a defense agreement with Kuwait, with Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams stressing that Washington did not intend to keep permanent bases in the oil-rich emirate.

Kuwait's official news agency KUNA said Wednesday's announcement came after a Cabinet meeting headed by Sheik Saad al-Salem al-Saban, the crown prince.

Al-Othman was quoted as saying the agreement would cover the use of Kuwaiti facilities, pre-positioning of defense materials and logistical support.

Kuwait is still struggling to rebuild the nation's 16,000-member army, which crumbled after the Aug. 2, 1990 invasion by Iraqi troops.

Pro-Thomas ad stirs debate

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Conservative groups Thursday spurned a personal appeal from White House Chief of Staff John Sununu to yank a Pro-Clarence Thomas television ad attacking the ethics of three Democratic senators.

They said they would keep running the controversial commercial until "left-wing groups. . . enter into political cease-fire" over the Supreme Court nomination.

The White House said Sununu called L. Brent Bozell III of the Conservative Victory Committee on Wednesday evening to urge him to stop running the commercial, which assails Democratic Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Joesph Biden of Delaware, and Alan Cranston of California.

"Unfortunately, the administration has no desire to confront the radical left," said Bozell, the committee's executive director, and Floyd Brown, chairman of Citizens United, in a statement.

"We didn't start the politicalization and 'attack' campaigns now surrounding the nomination," they said, charging that liberal groups "viciously destroyed Judge (Robert) Bork in 1987" in his unsuccessful confirmation fight.

"Until the left agrees to discontinue all its efforts against Judge Thomas, our two-week campaign in the D.C. market will continue," the conservative activists said.

Vice President Dan Quayle said Thursday that the ad sponsors "got a lot of free publicity" because of the media coverage of the controversy.

"There's a way to be successful and a way to self-destruct," Quayle said.

Women's tennis seeking revenge in opener

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Revenge is on the mind of the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team as they host Mount Holyoke College tomorrow for their season opener at the Upper Boyden courts at 1 p.m.

Last spring, the Minutewomen lost to the Lions, 5-4, in a match that Coach Edwin Gentzler said his team didn't take too seriously.

"We won't take them lightly again," Gentzler said. "They sort of snuck up on us last year."

"We're definitely looking to get some revenge," co-captain Gail Girasella said. "I have really high expectations for our match. We've been working really hard."

Mount Holyoke head Coach Philip Ritchie described his team this year as having an impressive mixture of baseline and serve-and-volley players. Lesley Minehan will most likely be the No. 1 singles player, followed by Tiffany Crawford, according to Ritchie. Ritchie was unsure of the remaining lineup, due to injuries, but did mention Kathy Brennan and Colleen Denny as potential singles starters.

Shizuko Yamasaki leads the UMass attack as she is the No. 1 singles player followed by co-captain Gail Girasella in the No. 2 position. Amy Ryan, who had the best record last season, will be No. 3 with Kerensa Eddy at No. 4. After displaying a great pre-season, according to Gentzler, Stacy Scheckner will be No. 5 and Kerri Kaminski will round out the singles lineup.

Girasella and Eddy will head the doubles team charge followed by Yamasaki and Ryan. Gentzler said senior co-captain Sarah Nadolny and Pam Levine could also see doubles action.

"I expect we'll be very strong," Gentzler said. "I've never seen such good attitudes. They're mentally tougher and more experienced this year and they know what they have to do."

"Everyone looks really good," Nadolny said. "Usually, we need time in the beginning, but we've come ready to play this season."

Mount Holyoke, a Division III tennis powerhouse finished last season, 8-15 and placed 12th in the New England Collegiate Tennis Tournament.

"We're pretty even, but I think we're going to beat them," Nadolny said. "We're ready and we really want it."

"It'll be close," said Gentzler. "But, I like our chances."

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.

Engineering student? Smart.

Math or science major? Also smart.

On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.

You don't have to do it anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-81 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature and so many other smart functions.

We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-81. That's why they're so highly recommended.

For engineering students, The TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, provides complex number functions and offers formula programming. That's power.

And for math and science applications, the TI-81 offers the most comprehensive, yet easy-to-use graphing functions with extensive programming capabilities.

Try a TI-68 or TI-81 at your local TI retailer today. And start working smarter, instead of harder.

GEMINI/May 21-June 20): Romance is in the air. A passive attitude is not the way to professional or personal success! Get involved in important discussions. Family attitudes are clearer now. Stand up for your beliefs.
CANCER/June 21-July 22): Resistance to change is holding you back and could prove expensive if you do not wake up soon. Short trips are useful. Postpone signing legal or financial papers until more data are available.
LEO/July 23-Aug. 22): Staying fit and trim is as good for your state of mind as your looks. Teamwork helps everyone make more money!
VIRGO/Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Make a new plan to achieve your career goals. Further study or research will boost your earning potential. Be open to suggestions from your mate or business partner. Fresh ideas are essential.
LIBRA/Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An older person may want to go into business with you but lacks capital. Be flexible. A short conference with an attractive member of the opposite sex could give you romantic ideas.
SCORPIO/Oct. 23- Nov. 21): Your spirits are high, thanks to a terrific financial or career break. An unexpected gift will add to the fun. An absorbing artistic project could lead to your starting your own business.
SAGITTARIUS/Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A snobbish attitude will only make enemies; show your more generous side. Socialize with younger people when the opportunity arises. A blind date could turn out even better than you anticipated.
CAPRICORN/Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Routine tasks are boring but necessary. Complete paperwork before starting a new project. A change of scenery sounds delightful. A friend or relative helps you cut through red tape. Buy a special gift.
AQUARIUS/Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Extra money comes in, making you wildly happy. Try not to criticize grown offspring. They must lead their own lives now. A social evening perks up your spirits. Wear something really elegant.
PISCES/Feb. 19-March 20): Be prepared to deal with someone who tries to swipe your business or contacts. A new neighbor could turn your thoughts toward romance. You shine in the role of host.

and Kutztown University.

If UMass can get by Kutztown in its opener they will play the winner of the B.C.-Dayton contest. Yarworth admits that while Iona is the more competitive rival, "B.C.'s reason for water polo living is to beat UMass. Every time we play them we HAVE to beat them."

B.C. hasn't claimed bragging rights in over four years. Last year's tournament saw the Minutemen nip the Eagles 11-10 behind then senior, now Assistant Coach, Jon Miller's eight goals.

Minutemen look to make it two in a row

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

For the first time in his six years at the University of Massachusetts, Coach Jim Reid does not have to answer questions about jinx or losing streaks before his team plays Delaware. This year he has to answer the question whether the Minutemen can run their winning streak against the Fightin' Blue Hens to two.

"It's a little simpler to prepare for them this year now that we don't have to answer why we always lose to them," Reid said.

Last year's game against Delaware will forever be remembered as the game which Gary Wilkos broke a vertebra in his back. However, there was also a football game. The UMass defense carried the team to its first victory against Delaware (17-3) in 15 attempts. The Minutemen defense held the Hens to just 135 yards of total offense. The feared Wing-T attack gained only 11 yards on the ground and quarterback Bill Vergantino was sacked eight times.

Delaware brings to Amherst the same famed Wing-T offense, an offense which causes opposing defenses mass confusion and the improved version of Vergantino.

"It's an offense which creates great blocking angles, a lot of misdirection plays and plenty of deception," Reid said. "You can run out of a pass formation and pass out of a run formation."

Delaware opened the season last week with a resounding 28-0 drubbing of West Chester, a Division II school. Vergantino missed the second half of the game with a strained shoulder but is expected to start tomorrow. He rushed for 62 yards on eight carries in the first half and completed six of eight passes for 64 yards and one touchdown.

"It really helps them that they've played a game," Reid said. "They should be coming in here with a great deal of confidence, their kicking game is outstanding, their defense is great and Bill [Vergantino] is a terrific player." Ironically, the Minutemen recruited Vergantino.

The Minutemen open the season with a new quarterback, Tom Fasano, three new offensive linemen and the return of Jerome Bledsoe to the backfield.

Fasano is looking forward to his opportunity to quarterback the Minutemen but admits that come game time he will have a few butterflies in his stomach.

Bledsoe is eager to start the season after his year's absence from the field due to an ankle injury. He is confident in Fasano's ability to run the offense.

"We can't make mistakes on offense and we have to create turnovers on defense," Reid said.

Fasano said, "It would be nice if the defense could put a zero on the board every week."

UMass flanker Eric Thimas who returned a punt 61 yards for a touchdown last year against Delaware has been limping at practice for the past two weeks. He is expected to play tomorrow.

"We've got a lot of bumps and bruises," Reid said. "But that's to be expected at this time of the year."

Football notes: The game will begin at 1:30 p.m., and can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM, WSPR, 1270 AM and WTTT, 1430 AM.

Students wanting to attend the game will be admitted with their student ID.

Soccer teams face road tests in season openers

• Reds must overcome uncertainty, Vermont

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Season openers are always a time of uncertainty for coaches. This year it's no different for University of Massachusetts women's soccer Coach Jim Rudy as he prepares for Saturday's game at the University of Vermont.

Rudy lost six starters to graduation, had trouble recruiting due to a lack of scholarship money, and was further hindered due to a new NCAA rule banning pre-season scrimmages.

"In my 20 years of coaching I have never returned so few players," Rudy said. "It would have been difficult to prepare for this year anyway but without the scrimmages it's like we are just flying into the season blindly.

"We have a very mentally and physically tough team. They worked hard in the off-season and I expect them to be more aggressive defensively and more physical than last year's team," Rudy said.

The Reds, who finished 10-5-2 last season, are ranked No. 13 in the nation in the NCAA pre-season poll. UVM is unranked and is coming off of a 9-6-1 season.

Rudy is relying on strong play from senior forwards Tracey Arwood and Colleen Millikens.

"We don't have one dominant scorer on this team," Rudy said. "We need to have an all around attack from our forwards. They work well together and hopefully they can score some goals."

The defense is strong with the return of first team All-New England Defenseman Holly Hellmuth. Also expected to contribute are Carrie Kaoeper and freshman Heidi Kocher.

"Holly is a big part of our team, she has always done well for us," Rudy said. "Heidi is a freshman who should make an impact. She is an attacking defenseman who will play on Saturday."

In the net, Rudy is blessed with not one but two outstanding players. Briana Scurry and Skye Eddy should share the goaltending duties this year. Scurry will start against UVM since Eddy is suffering from a quadracept injury.

"It's both a strength and a weakness to have two good keepers," Rudy said. "It is good to know that I can throw either player in there and I will get a great performance but it is tough emotionally on them."

Vermont is led by senior forwards Rachel Bondy and Debbie Cook; both were 2nd team all-New England selections in 1990. Also important for the Lady Catamounts is goalie Joey Fritz.

"We rely on Fritz a lot but she usually comes up strong," said UVM coach John Carter. "We lost a couple of seniors and we should be a very different team from last year. I am not sure how good we are because of the scrimmage situation but hopefully we will play an all around sound game."

"Vermont always plays well against us, they are very tough to beat," Rudy said. "We lost 1-0 two years ago in Burlington and I expect them to be just as tough this year."

UMass won last years game 2-0 in Amherst.

"[UVM] was just a few goals away from being 12-4 last year, they are a good team," Rudy said. "Fritz always plays us tough and their forwards are very strong. This game won't be easy but we are a team that isn't easy to beat."

"We are going to have to play on the top of our game to beat UMass," Carter said. "They lost a lot to graduation but they still are very strong. However, because of the no scrimmage rule I don't know how good we are nor how good they are."

The uncertainty will end on Saturday.

• Men set to battle St. Bonaventure, Siena

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team kicks off its season with back to back games this weekend against St. Bonaventure and Siena.

Tomorrow, the Minutemen travel to McGraw-Jennings Field in St. Bonaventure, N.Y. for their first Atlantic-10 Conference showdown with the Bonnies at 1 p.m.

Finishing with a disappointing 1-16 overall record last year (0-8 in the A-10), the Bonnies can only go upward.

"I really believe team intensity will be a strength for us this year," Bonnies Coach George Perry III said. "We'll need better collective defense and more patience on offense."

One area of improvement, according to Perry, is at midfield. The Bonnie middle men include freshman Justin Bigham and junior transfers Mark Tucci and Aaron Zandy. Zandy transferred from UMass and was eligible to play this season for the Bonnies since this is the last soccer season at UMass. He was second in assists for the Minutemen last year.

"We should have players who not only can win the ball back but maintain possession and make the right decisions when to go to forward," Perry said. "When we attack, we'll attack with eight or nine players as opposed to one or two in the past."

Among the 17 returning players for the Bonnies, two are the leading goal scorers from last year. Phil Gombatto, a junior defenseman had three goals and one assist while forward Dan Gilhooly had two goals and four assists. These totals are not that staggering due to the fact the Bonnies only scored 11 goals in their 17 games last year.

Weak at the goalie position, the Bonnies look to rely on their defense. Rob Ferguson and Chris Leardini lead that core, while junior Chris Koons faces a tough job in net.

Koons played in nine games last season in which he came out with an 0-4 record and a 3.30 goals against average.

"St. Bonaventure has really improved from last season," said UMass coach Sam Koch. "It is both teams' first game and they're gonna' battle."

In goal for the Minutemen will be senior John Gruber who was competing with Mark Wolf and Jonathan Roche to retain the starting job.

Leading the offense for the Minutemen will be Randy Jacobs, Ray Cunha, and Brett Anthony. Jacobs led the Minutemen in scoring last season with 12 points (four goals, four assists).

After opening with the Bonnies, the Minutemen continue their road trip at Siena. UMass' first five games are on the road and they don't play at home until September 21.

The Saints, like the Bonnies, are hoping to make this season a winning one. They finished 5-12 last year and 4-4 in the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference.

UMass and Siena shared one common opponent last season, that being Fairfield University. The Minutemen defeated Fairfield 6-1, while the Saints lost 3-2.

"Two games back to back is tough," Koch said. "It will be tough to keep the work rate up. I'm not sure what our game plan will be since I've never seen Siena or St. Bonaventure play.

"It would be nice to kick someone else besides ourselves," he said.

Water polo set for dual in the water at Army

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts water polo team travels to West Point, New York this weekend to defend its championship in the Army Invitational Tournament. The defending champions have been seeded No. 1.

Head Coach Russ Yarworth fields a team that is "young but experienced," and while the starters have already been selected he wants to "experiment with a few things."

There are four seniors and seven juniors returning from last year's 16-9 squad and Yarworth praises this team's chemistry.

"The kids are focused and motivated," he said. "The goal is to get good experience and if we can come away with a win (for the championship), that would be great. But I want to come away with the experience. I think that will take us where we want to go later in the season."

Yarworth has been putting the team through three-a-day practices since August 25, but says that even though the team may be a little tired from such a grueling schedule, "they know what is expected of them."

There are no serious injuries to speak of, however, freshman Javier Gonzalez will miss the tournament because he is participating in the Junior World Championships in his native country Puerto Rico. Gonzalez is due to arrive on campus Monday. The strongest teams at "The Point" this weekend will be arch rivals Iona and Boston College, Dayton, and host Army. Also included are Queens, Saint Francis,

Azerbaijan conducts free elections

Baltic states celebrate, while ethnic disputes erupt in Georgia

MOSCOW (AP) — The southern republic of Azerbijan held its first popular presidential election yesterday, and its current leader, a Communist, was headed for victory as the only candidate on the ballot.

About 50,000 people brought their blank ballots to Freedom Square in Baku, the capitol, to protest the alleged vote fraud, the independent Turan news agency said.

Despite the allegations and a call for a boycott by an opposition group, turnout was heavy and President Ayaz Mutalibov was expected to win easily, news agencies reported.

Mutalibov, leader of the republic since 1990, called the election in June, months before an Aug. 18-21 hard-line coup in Moscow led to the disintegration of the party and central control.

Zardusht Arlizadek, an opposition figure from the Social Democratic party, withdrew his candidacy last week to protest what the Popular Front had termed "undemocratic elections."

The separated Popular Front of Azerbaijah has been calling for the elections to be postponed, apparently because the opposition had not been able to organize.

The Muslim republics of the Soviet Union traditionally have been the most supportive of Kremlin policies and the last to adopt the democratic principles that other republics have embraced.

Elsewhere in the fragmenting Soviet Union, an unspecified number of people were killed in ethnic violence in the South Ossetia region of the republic of Georgia, the Tass news agency reported Sunday.

In the Baltics, tens of thousands of people celebrated their new independence in rallies in Lithuania and Estonia. Also in Lithuania, a convoy of Soviet vehicles left the capitol, Vilnius.

Citing alleged voting irregularities, the Popular Front of Azerbaijan said election observers were not allowed in some polling stations and that officials handed out multiple ballots to some voters so they could vote on behalf of their families, Turan reported.

In one-candidate elections, voters can approve or reject the candidate.

Such elections were a hallmark of Soviet politics before the President Mikhail Gorbachev took power in 1985, but have been rare in recent years under his democratic reforma.

Scarce goods such as sugar, sausage, candy and cookies were put on sale at polling places to attract voters, the Popular Front alleged.

Election officials said 78.7 percent of the eligible voters had cast ballots by late afternoon, according to the Tass news agency.

Mutalibov, 53, is an economist and technocrat who rose through the Communist Party ranks to head the republic.

Following the failed coup, Mutalibov remained a party member but quit as its leader and seized party properties. Azerbaijan also joined other republics in declaring independence from the Kremlin.

Despite the republic's declaration, the Kremlin supports Mutalibov because he does not demand complete independence for the predominantly Muslim republic, Vagif Samedoglu, a member of the People's Front, told the rally in Freedom Square. His remarks were reported by Turan.

The republic of 7 million is also engaged in an ethnic conflict with the mainly Christian neighboring republic of Armenia. The dispute centers on Nagorno-Karabakh, a mainly Armenian enclave that Azerbaijan controls.

in the region of South Ossetia, north of the capitol, Tbilisi, Tass said.

The news agency said several Georgians and South Ossetians were killed.

Needs of Soviets crucial in transition towards democracy

JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Although the Soviet Union's transition toward democracy is racing forward, the needs of the Soviet people must be met for democracy to last, said a University of Massachusetts Soviet expert.

Prof. Robert Jones, chairman of the history department and a specialist in Soviet political and economic history, said democratic forces must find a solution to the current economic problems to avoid a repitition of the past.

"The Communist regime got into trouble because it couldn't meet people's needs and aspirations," Jones said. "If democracy fails to solve the problems and the problems get worse, then democracy itself may be seen as a problem."

Jones said a similar pattern arose in the summer and fall of 1917 during the Russian Revolution. The Czar had been overthrown in February of that year, and when people were unable to obtain what they needed, the Bolsheviks were allowed an opportunity to come to power, he said.

Jones, former head of the Soviet/East European Studies program, said that aid to the Soviet Union from the United States and other western nations is largely dependent on the resources available to those nations.

"There are two possible types of aid," Jones said. "The first type is short-term emergency relief to avoid something like a

UMass drops opener to Fightin' Blue Hens

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Coach Jim Reid knew that in order to beat Delaware on opening day, his team had to be able to run the ball effectively and keep the Delaware offense off the field. They did neither.

The Fightin' Blue Hens stormed into Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday afternoon. Fresh off a resounding 28-0 win over West Chester the week before, they rushed for 263 yards, held UMass to just 105 yards on the ground and walked off the field with their second win of the season, 24-7.

Reid yanked starting quarterback Tom Fasano who completed seven of 15 passes for 77 yards, threw two interceptions and carried 10 times for 41 yards after the third quarter. His replacement Paul Tornatore (9-14, 170 yards, one touchdown and one interception) did something that Fasano was unable to do; march the team into the end zone.

"Tornatore was really exciting down the end," Reid said. "I felt good that we were moving the ball, we just couldn't finish off drives."

With 8:36 remaining in the game and the Minutemen trailing 17-0, Tornatore capped a six-play, 69-yard drive with a touchdown pass to Lamar Newsome (five catches for 97 yards and a touchdown) who was behind two Delaware defenders in the corner of the end zone.

The UMass defense promptly stopped Delaware but punter Gene Vadas (six punts, 47.5 yards per punt) boomed a kick into the endzone, forcing the Minutemen to start at their own 20 yard line with 6:30 to play.

Tornatore hit Jerome Bledsoe (five catches for 84 yards) over the middle for nine yards to open the drive. On the next play, he shoveled a pass to Bledsoe who sprinted 44 yards down field. It looked as if Bledsoe might break away and run it into the end zone for the second UMass touchdown, but he was caught by four Delaware defenders.

Now at the Delaware 27-yard line, Tornatore looped a pass that was picked off by Warren McIntire who ran 64 yards for a touchdown to seal the Delaware victory. It was McIntire's third interception of the game, tying a school record.

"It was a bad throw," Tornatore said. "They came with a blitz, I should have taken the sack."

Shopping center leaves students hungry

BROOKE WHEELER
Collegian Correspondent

The shopping center is as deeply rooted in the tradition of American life as the station wagon. The early years are spent in the cart, fat baby legs dangling, a plastic flap under our diapered behinds. We evolve quickly, the "skirt-clinging years" giving way to gradual independence.

And now — the last shopping trip with parents for college. And sometimes a trauma indeed.

"The first thing I felt when I walked into Stop 'n Shop with my parents last year was panic," remembers sophomore apparel marketing major Meredith Kelly. "I realized there would be no more leaving shopping lists in the kitchen in the morning to find the pantry full when I got home from school."

Freshman student Allison Grady fought the urge to "buy everything in sight — just in case. I guess I didn't want to think that I'd soon have to be supporting myself out here. I wanted to spend as much of my parent's money as I could before they left so I'd be spending less of my own."

Indeed, students begin to realize self-sufficiency as the goal in their new lives. They think of the dorm as their own little apartment and want to outfit it as such.

Richard Raftery, assistant manager of Price Chopper, says the biggest sales — besides food — are in cleaning supplies.

He said appliance sales follow close behind in volume. Coffee makers, toasters and hot pots are standards, but with the advent of the miraculous MicroFridge, a one-piece microwave, refrigerator and full-size freezer, more students in the residence halls are cooking for themselves.

Raftery notes frozen, microwaveable foods are becoming as popular as the traditional spaghetti and mac & cheese.

To assist students in their shopping, Price Chopper circulated a coupon flyer with a checklist of important items on the back. Some of the coupons include savings on notebooks,

Faculty follows Soviet changes

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

As each passing day renders the previous day's changes in the Soviet Union obsolete, faculty at the University of Massachusetts attempt to find ways to keep pace with the flow of events.

The historic wave of change has been particularly relevant to the Soviet/East European Studies department at UMass. This department is an interdisciplinary major program drawing from courses in Slavic languages and literature, history, political science, anthropology and economics, said department head Robert Rothstein.

Rothstein, a professor of Slavic languages, said he keeps in touch with faculty members at Warsaw University via electronic mail to chart events.

"We all keep up in various ways," Rothstein said. "[Through electronic mail] I can come into class and give copies of results of public opinion polls, information about current legislation, or the latest statement by Lech Walesa."

Robert Jones, chairman of the history department and former head of Soviet Studies, said he "does what nearly everyone else does, except more intensely.

"I watch CNN every day, read the New York Times, or call friends in the USSR," Jones said.

Jones will be leading a group of 15 to 25 faculty, alumni and students on an annual trip to Moscow, Kiev, and Leningrad. He said while the last two years have been times of extreme historical change, this year will probably be more important historically than any other year he has traveled there.

Rothstein, who teaches fourth-year Russian, said the last few years have brought about an increased interest in the study of Russian language among UMass students.

"More students have been continuing study in Russian on to the advanced level," Rothstein said. "Before, students would more often just take the first or second year just to fill a language requirement."

"Also, more students are going to summer programs and exchanges there," Rothstein said.

Earlier this month, 13 UMass students embarked on a semester-long exchange trip to Leningrad State Technical Institute.

Keeping up with rapid changes has been made more difficult by continued budget cuts, which deplete the faculty and resources available for Soviet studies, Rothstein said.

"As people retire or take jobs elsewhere, it's hard to replace them," Rothstein said. He said the Slavic department lost one faculty member last December and the half-time position of area studies coordinator was eliminated last spring.

Autumn add-drop less of a mess according to Registrar's office

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Students generally encountered shorter add-drop lines this year than in previous years, according to preliminary figures from the Registrar's Office.

"It appears there were fewer course changes this semester than in the past," said Karin Sherbin, the University spokesperson.

About 18,000 add-drop forms were handed out to students needing to add courses to their schedule or drop uneccessary ones, Sherbin said.

English Department chairperson Robert Bagg said his department's line was fast-moving, efficient and "much, much better" than in years past.

He was unsure if the improvement was due to students preregistering "more sensibly" or the declining undergraduate enrollment.

"It improved considerably. The heavy crowd that we usually get disappeared by 11:30 a.m." said Ernest Gallo, the scheduling officer for the English department.

He said in past years students were still waiting to sign up for their English courses in the late afternoon.

The psychology scheduling officer, Joanne Daughdrill, said this semester the add-drop lines "moved rather quickly." Last semester, three students who had spent the entire night camping out in Tobin Hall to add badly-needed classes fainted, she said.

She said no similiar incidents happened this year.

Daughdrill said some of the improvement may have been due to the phone pre-registration and add-drop system that the University is testing.

Third World Position

Compiled from staff reports

The staff of the Collegian's Third World Affairs page had nothing to do with the controversial flyers recently posted on campus, said TWA Editor Madanmohan Rao in a statement last week.

Regarding the flyer mentioned in the story "Posted flyers outrage campus community" (Collegian, Sept. 6), Rao said, "Our staff had no knowledge of or participation in this flyer. Simply, we had nothing to do with it."

Rao said the most disturbing thing was the reaction of various institutions and elements on campus, which have sought to use the incident to discredit the page and its staff.

"There is a clear pattern of institutional behavior that is hostile to our efforts and tries to undermine them by exploiting every opportunity, however far-fetched," he said.

Rao concluded by saying their response to this incident must be viewed in this context, and is without a doubt a part of this unfortunate pattern of unreasonable hostility.

famine — this is a band-aid."

"More significant is the type to help investment," Jones said. "This is less likely, as it would depend on the people of the former Soviet Union getting their act together about what the money would be used for."

The first type of aid would require surplus food, something which is more abundant in the West than surplus dollars, Jones said.

The most recent plan Soviet officials have embraced is the idea of an economic union similar to that of the European Community.

"Something like that is necessary in the short run," Jones said. "Those economies have been so integrated for so long that some type of economic cooperation is necessary.

"The Soviet Union was a strange and inefficient common market, but it was a common market," Jones said.

Although it is impossible to predict overall trends among all the former Soviet republics, many smaller republics maintain bitterness about what Jones called "Russian imperialism", which may increase regional and ethnic tensions in the near future.

pens, mops, bulk foods and potato chips. There is even one coupon for a free loaf of bread when you buy a jar of peanut butter.

Once students get past the last shopping trip, they develop certain survival skills needed to sustain themselves, says college veteran shoppers. Pragmatism, list-writing, bargain hunting — these are all skills needed by the post-parental shopper.

For Daniel Sarti, a UMass junior and economics major living in an apartment off-campus, self-sufficiency shopping largely includes spaghetti. He has simplified his visits to the store by simplifying his needs.

"Bread, milk, spaghetti, soup," he said. "But no coupons."

Chad Sulkala, a senior journalism major, has adapted to off-campus life by realizing certain priorities in his shopping list.

"The thing I definitely fear running out of most is coffee," he said.

Other items high up on the list are tortilla chips and salsa, Pringles, and 10-K drink, he said. He also had 2 lbs. of sugar in his cart.

Aside from shopping to sustain themselves, for students the neighborhood supermarket also seems to occasionally serve as a recreational place. Most of the students interviewed admitted to at least one or two rides around the store in a cart.

Brenda Basile has worked at Price Chopper for six years and has witnessed quite a few of these little joy rides.

"It always seems to be the big football-player types who do it. It's pretty strange to see these big guys wheeling around in a little cart," she said.

Manager of Stop 'n Shop Chuck Kinney said "once in awhile you get some students with a little more 'enthusiasm' than you'd like to see, but that's possible anywhere."

UMass freshman engineering student and Stop 'n Shop employee Joseph Maldonadlo said he has seen students goofing around a lot, even in his short time here. He has also witnessed first-hand some of the in-store chaos of parents and students on that last shopping trip, but has yet to experience it himself.

"I figure I'll eat mostly at the D.C.," he said.

The prices may go up, but the cycle continues for coming of age in the supermarket.

expected his team to play to the best of their ability under the circumstances.

After the disappointing outing he added, "We played hard and should have come up with something, but sometimes things just don't go your way. I think we're evenly matched when at full strength, but they are certainly a confident and consistent team. Ed has done a heck of a job."

Clearly, Coach Gentzler has a strong commitment and dedication to his team as he demonstrates by his encouragement, patient coaching, and even taking a 90 percent cut in pay. It is this dedication that makes his players try a little harder and hustle a little more.

At the end of the grueling day, a bit sunburnt but still beaming Coach Gentzler stated, "We were hittng the ball hard and our team was mentally prepared. We're older, more experienced, and everybody came through for us today. This was certainly a team effort and I'm really proud of my girls."

Cohesion, that's what it's all about.

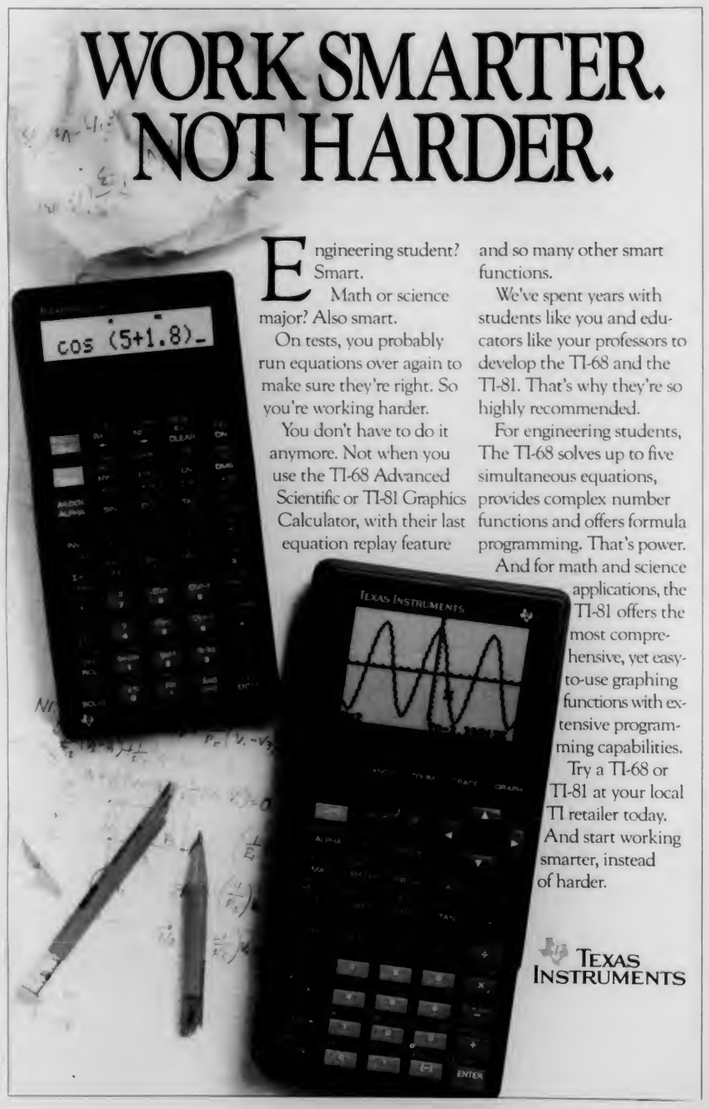
The Collegian in Noho. Too cool!

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.



Engineering student? Smart.

Math or science major? Also smart.

On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.

You don't have to do it anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-81 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature and so many other smart functions.

We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-81. That's why they're so highly recommended.

For engineering students, The TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, provides complex number functions and offers formula programming. That's power.

And for math and science applications, the TI-81 offers the most comprehensive, yet easy-to-use graphing functions with extensive programming capabilities.

Try a TI-68 or TI-81 at your local TI retailer today. And start working smarter, instead of harder.

UMass is out to get me

Jared Blaut

Welcome one and all to my little world, which is probably a lot like yours but with more rabbits.

I'd like to jump naked right into today's topic, which is "Nun Sacrifice." I don't support it, and you shouldn't either. I firmly believe this.

I also firmly believe in a freshman's right to be given appropriate directions and not just be pointed in a completely random direction. "Walk about five miles this way. You can't miss it" seems to be the habit with upperclassmen and the faculty around here.

It didn't take me much time to discover that the remnants of what I'm sure was once a thriving and helpful staff - the kind of staff that was never too busy to get a cat out of a tree or walk little Timmy to school but now consists of about 20 people due to the financial genius of Michael Dukakis - thinks that giving wrong directions to an innocent "first-year student" is the funniest thing since the bricks fell off the library, killing several hundred people. Mostly "first-year students," I hear.

I spent several vain hours searching for a Stupid Piece of Electronic Equipment (or TAU). I went innocently from building to building, from one mocking staff member to another, only to discover that I couldn't get the thing for another four days. But they couldn't tell me that to begin with. No, that might have made life easy for me, and God knows they can't let that happen.

The individual staff members at UMass communicate and coordinate with one another about as well as the members of the Soviet government. The only difference is that in the Soviet Union, the food tastes better.

Not everything I've run into at UMass so far has been terrible, however. For instance, that insanely long trek to and from Orchard Hill and up six flights of stairs every day that renders all of us who live there totally lifeless and wanting nothing but a nice cool drink to replenish the ten pounds of water we just lost.

But when we get to the soda machine, we discover that it has PMS and doesn't want to accept quarters, hence leaving us all to die in a pool of our own sweat, which will probably be very theraputic for us all in the long run.

I wouldn't be the patient guy that I am today if it wasn't for those wonderful 20 hour add-drop lines, which I waited in only to find that every course I wanted was conveniently closed because the staff is evil. I'm fully convinced that the education system in the state of Massachusetts is run by the devil, and the only way anybody keeps their job is to promise their souls to him for all eternity. (Please don't send me any letters saying "Well how do you know that Beelzebub isn't a woman? If anyone wants to argue the gender of the source of all evil, don't include me.)

Not that I'm bitter.

Jared Blaut is a UMass student

Is it me, or are on-campus parties what they used to be?

Gayle Long

I think I'm getting too old to have any fun.

I'm an alumnus of the Orchard Hill Residential Area — Grayson, to be more exact. The two years I spent in the dorms were fun, to say the least.

Fun is such an undescriptive word, though. The words dizzying, wild, incomprehensible and uncontrollable are much better — they capture the whole idea in every aspect possible.

We all know the time in the University is supposed to be a learning experience — and for the staff it continues to be one.

For example, they still are trying to learn how underaged residents not only get alcohol, but manage to smuggle it into their rooms along with the 40 or 50 people all armed with keg cups that end up all over the floor and in the bathroom, none of which remember their names or where exactly they are from.

You know, the first week craziness when everyone fights about the Red Sox, the microfridge, and whether or not a minor can actually be arrested for possession of alcohol.

Anyway, now that I have matured to the legal age and live in an apartment in the auspicies of quiet living somewhere in the greater Amherst area, I have done what I always set out not to do.

Go to Southwest.

I mean, why bother? I never had to leave my cluster for a good party when I lived on campus, why in heil would I ever even consider the evil and debauchery as something worthwhile?

I used to say with pride that I didn't have to go to a tower to go to a party. But I bothered. Why?

Because one of my friends, a good Catholic girl from Worcester — a JUNIOR — had decided to take a chance and move into one of the ugliest buildings on campus — John Quincy Adams.

It took a friend and I a while to figure out what building it was — I had never even been there in the broad daylight.

It smelled like I thought it would. The smell of hairspray and cheap cologne hung heavily in the air. The smell of vomit and bad beer permeated my nostrils. Loud Motley Crue and Van Halen clashed in the air above.

My friend answered our call on those wonderful help phones — which you have to scream into when all the drunk people are trying to figure out who is going to take them to the package store or where the best fraternity is.

After she figured out what was going on, she came down with some man from her floor who signed us in — she had already signed in her limit.

The party was a party, with a large bucket filled with an orange substance which looked like orange juice with urine in it.

People were drunk, just like in Orchard Hill, Central, Northeast and Sylvan. People were affectionate — just like when I lived on campus.

It was a pretty normal scene, even though some of the people actually enjoyed being so sick they spent the majority of their evenings worshipping the porcelin god.

The only problem was, I didn't enjoy it like I did when I lived on campus. Why?

When I was a freshman, I loved this stuff. Going to the D.C. with a hangover for Saturday brunch was cool.

But I left this spectacle with a bad taste in my mouth. Maybe it was Alka-Seltzer — because I just felt old.

I get annoyed with drunk girls with Champion sweatshirts and guys who continually ask you your name and what your major is.

I get claustrophobic in a room where the number of people exceed the number of breathable oxygen atoms.

I get disgusted in elevators where they put down cardboard on the weekends in case someone vomits on the trip to the 20th floor.

If you are angry with my column, do me a favor. Instead of yelling about it and telling all of your friends what a complete bitch I am — do me a favor:

Keep this column in your wallet and read it in two years to see if you feel the same way. If you've grown up, you will. If you don't, get some help.

Pet lover asks students to think before purchasing a furry friend

The start of the semester is a time of new beginnings for many. Students come from far and wide to study at the five colleges, while making their home in the area. Unfortunately, many feel it an appropriate time to add to their family by adopting or purchasing a pet.

While the time can be very special, an important fact to recognize is that adding a pet to one's life is a 10 to 15 year commitment, not a semester or academic year experience.

The end of semester period finds many animals abandoned and alone, especially at the end of the spring semester. Typically these dear animals are in the young adult age bracket, having been cute kittens or puppies the previous September. The majority of these former pets die within three months, either from wandering, lack of nutrition and water or euthanasia.

The responsibilities of caring for a pet include: financial ability to cover regular vaccinations, examinations and the spay/neuter procedure, possible emergency care, food, litter for cats, licenses for dogs, supplies including bowls, collars, etc., and preferably some toys; time for exercise, grooming feeding and affection.

Owning a pet requires lots of work, but can be a rewarding experience for a decade or more.

Please do not adopt, or purchase a pet unless you can truly make that 10 year commitment to the pet. That "fur person" is counting on you, and is dependent on your provision for its needs.

Tony Vacca, Tim Moran break music boundaries

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

On today's music scene, artists are stretching the boundaries of the labels used to describe their work. "Jazz" and "world" music are perhaps undergoing the most change, and helping to shed the problems of inaccurate labels are Tony Vacca and Tim Moran.

Along with Foday Musa Suso, Moran and Vacca have accomplished the difficult task of becoming multi-instrumentalists. Tim Moran plays alto and soprano sax, flute, and a variety of percussion instruments.

Tony Vacca plays the balafon, which is a West African originated xylophone, as well as snare drum, high hat, talking drum, and a variety of gongs, bells and whistles.

Musa Suso's primary instrument is the dousnn'gouni, an African "guitar", which is played in a manner similar to the bass violin. It keeps time and provides a rhythmic foundation which creates the basis for the improvisations of Vacca and Moran.

Moran's phrasings on soprano sax highlighted the gig. His soprano play seemed effortless. It was flute-like in its bright and airy tone, and his ability to alternate between legato and pizzicato phrasings was excellent.

Vacca's play on the balafon provided a drive to the feel of the music, rising and falling in intensity.

Reid said, "That interception was not his fault, the receiver went the wrong way."

Delaware scored on three straight possessions in the first half to go ahead 17-0 at halftime.

Mark Drozic put Delaware on the board when he connected on a 25-yard field goal in the first quarter. The field goal was set up by UMass punter Jim Maguire's 15-yard punt that gave Delaware great field position at the UMass 20. Maguire's first punt was only 17 yards and he was eventually replaced by Mike George.

Delaware running back Lanue Johnson (15-72 yds) put the Hens ahead 10-0 when he scampered 29 yards untouched into the endzone.

Fasano's first interception set up Delaware's second touchdown. Marcus Lewis fumbled quarterback Bill Vergantino's initial pitch, but the ball bounced right back into his hands and he proceeded to run 30 yards untouched for six points to make it 17-0.

"I'm not sure we were as reckless and tough in the first half as we were in the second," Reid said.

Vergantino rushed for 55 yards and threw for 97 as he ran the Wing-T offense just like Coach Tubby Raymond wanted him to.

"Bill made some big plays on offense and our defense played an exceptional game," Raymond said.

The Minutemen racked up 352 yards of total offense, 247 via the air, while Delaware amassed 360 yards.

"What surprised me the most was all the big plays they had against our defense," Reid said.

UMass linebacker Mario Perry left the game in the first half with a sprained ankle. He did not return and his status for next week's game against Holy Cross is unknown.

Tennis downs Holyoke

Cohesion. A word that simply means "sticking together." Perhaps a picture of the UMass women's tennis team should accompany the definition.

Team cohesion was never more obvious than on Saturday as the Minutewomen were preparing to face Mount Holyoke. It wasn't just in the comraderie that came from raising the $5,000 they needed to fund their own season. It was in the way they laboriously policed the area around the tennis court and the reverent way they listened to coach Edwin Gentzler's pre-match pep talk.

The Minutewomen certainly heeded coach Gentzler words as they dominated Mount Holyoke in all nine matches en route to a 9-0 demoralization. In a pairing of No. 1's, senior Shizuko Yamasaki got a hard earned win against the more aggressive Wong and Jennifer Howe. Stacy Scheckner and Pam Levine got a victory over Wanda McNeely and Gretchen Conrad

The teams also played three exhibition matches which UMass swept. In singles play, Sarah Nadolny and Kelly Grim both disposed of their opponent by the score of 6-0, 6-0. Doubles play saw Bethan Thompson and Leslie Watts defeat Lishenn Tan and Stacy Derdorian 6-2, 6-2.

The Mount Holyoke team was hindered by injuries that kept three players sidelined. Mount Holyoke coach Phillip Ritchie said he

The UMass quarterback question resurfaces

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Before the University of Massachusetts football team's season opener on Saturday, head coach Jim Reid thought he had answered the biggest question of the preseason, "Who will be the starting quarterback?," for the last time.

However, one of the first questions asked of Reid after the Minutemen's 24-7 loss to Delaware was, "Who will be your starting quarterback?"

Tom Fasano was Reid's answer last week.

Reid's answer after Saturday's game; "I don't know."

Fasano lined up behind center at the start of Saturday's contest. However, for the entire fourth quarter Paul Tornatore took the snaps.

"Both guys moved the ball club," Reid said.

Running the option, Fasano completed seven passes in 15 attempts for 77 total yards. He also gained 41 yards on the ground on ten carries. But, he was unable to put any points on the board, yielded two crucial interceptions and fumbled after being sacked in the second quarter.

"You're never gonna put a guy in for the first game and be mistake-free," Reid said. "Tommy moved the ball well, no one can deny that. The option was giving us sizeable chunks of yards. He's a competitor."

Trailing 17-0, Reid called for the strong-armed Tornatore.

"What we needed to do is see if we could burn off some big chunks of yards," Reid said. "Our option game was going okay, but what we tried to do was get the ball to Lamar Newsome and Eric Thimas and Jerome [Bledsoe]. Hopefully to get us a big play."

Tornatore produced 170 yards in the air on nine completions in 14 attempts with a touchdown and an interception that was returned for a touchdown.

"Tornatore was really exciting in there," Reid said.

The Minuteman offense compiled 352 total net yards, only eight less than Delaware.

"I felt good in the first half," Fasano said. "We drove the ball, but just couldn't get it in the end zone. We have to just gel together."

When asked about being replaced by Tornatore, Fasano said, "I'm just a competitor and I always want to be in there. I'm upset, but Paul is a great drop-back passer and that's what we needed to do."

"I think I did pretty well," Tornatore said. "The offensive line did very well and gave me a lot of time [to throw]."

So, who will be UMass' quarterback next week against Holy Cross? History has shown that Reid highly prefers an option quarterback, especially with a strong stable of runners. However, Tornatore's passing game was productive Saturday.

"I hope I'm still number one," Fasano said. "We'll have to see on Monday."

Reid hinted at the possibility of using both quarterbacks during the same drive next Saturday; Fasano in running situations and Tornatore on passing downs. That was the route Reid took last season after starting quarterback Gary Wilkos broke a vertebra.

"If you can do something like that you can really put a lot of pressure on the opposing defense," Reid said about "flip-flopping" the quarterbacks.

There are also other possibilities. Reid could go to sophomore Dave McGovern, who started the last three games last year at quarterback, or the up-and-coming freshman Tony Williams.

"Those young guys will get a shot," Reid said. "They've got to keep on working."

"What I'd like to do is see this whole quarterback thing clean out," he said. "I've been this route before and I don't like it."

Women's soccer survives strange play, defeats UVM

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team opened it's season by defeating the University of Vermont 1-0. The win however may prove to be quite costly for the Reds as three UMass players went down with injuries during a game which head Coach Jim Rudy described as "rather unusual."

Holly Hellmuth netted the game winner in the 24th minute of the second half. Lisa Nickelson cleared the ball from out in front of the UMass net, Hellmuth collected it around midfield and drove down the right side into UVM territory. From around the 35-yard line she drilled the ball into the upper left corner of the net.

"It was a big-time shot, a world class shot," Rudy said. "It was just a very big play when we needed it most."

The game will be remembered most for its strange play and freak injuries.

"It was as strange of a game as I have ever seen played in my years in coaching, and I have been coaching for an awfully long time," Rudy said.

The game featured three UMass injuries, two of which would fall into the strange category. Kim Eynard separated her shoulder in the first half when she collided with a UVM player. Eynard was able to return to action later in the game.

"It was a real big collision," Rudy said. "Kim really got crunched out there."

Also in the first half the Reds lost Paula Wilkins with an ankle sprain. She did not return to play.

In the second half, Michele Woodside got the worst of a collision with UVM goalie Joey Fritz. There was a loose ball in front of the net and Fritz apparently tried to bat the ball away but ended up striking Woodside in the nose.

"She basically got punched square in the face," Rudy said. "We are not sure whether the nose is broken or not but there was a lot of blood. The injuries were both humorous and scary. I wasn't prepared to lose three key players but the team remained mentally strong.

"A lot of teams would have packed it in but this one dug down and played tough. I substituted in eight or nine players which is very high for me, but those players responded."

One player that responded well was Amy Cockley. Cockley is also a softball player and hadn't played soccer in two years until she joined the team on Wednesday.

"I obviously wasn't planning on using her with so little practice but she did a very good job," Rudy said. "It was just a pretty wild situation with all the injuries."

At one point in the second half Cockley got entangled with net-minder Fritz. Fritz grabbed a hold of Cockley's leg to keep her from getting to a loose ball. An obstruction penalty, which grants an indirect kick, was called but Rudy felt holding should have been called, meriting a penalty kick.

"That call was ridiculous, it was a clear cut case of holding and the referee just blew it," Rudy said. "A penalty kick would have been just what we needed but luckily we didn't lose on a bad call."

UVM outshot UMass 24-14, had six corner kicks to UMass's three, and each team had eight quality scoring opportunities. Fritz made 11 saves while Briana Scurry made 14 for the Reds, including two spectacular ones.

A UVM player took a shot from 25 yards out and it was headed for the upper corner until Scurry leaped to tip the ball over the crossbar. Later in the game she stuffed UVM's Debbie Cook from six feet out with a diving save.

"Those saves are very spectacular to look at but for Briana they are becoming routine," Rudy said. "She is always coming up big for us, she deserved this shutout."

Defense provides Minutemen with a quick start

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Stick to your guns, go with your instincts and whatever other cliches there might be to describe how the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team approached this past weekend's games.

Before this weekend, UMass coach Sam Koch had never seen Siena College or St. Bonaventure play. His thoughts were to go with a zone defense.

Koch's thoughts were correct as his soccer insight helped the Minutemen enjoy a double dose of success, shutting out both the Saints and the Bonnies, 6-0 and 1-0, respectively. The Minutemen stand 2-0 overall, (1-0 in the Atlantic-10 Conference), establishing some much needed confidence in a team with three more road games before their home opener on September 21.

"In the beginning we got caught a little by not putting enough pressure on Siena, but we were patient and we stuck with the zone," Koch said. "It worked well for us."

It certainly did, so well that the offense cranked up their level of play a couple of notches. Midfielder Justine Edelman began the shutout of the Saints yesterday, putting the ball in the net off a rebound at 26:00 of the first half.

Thirteen minutes and 18 seconds later, fellow middy Shawn Bleau, a Lynn native, assisted by Matt Edgerly, shot past the Siena defenders and goalkeeper to get the ball in the empty net.

"Sean took that ball all the way from Buffalo to Siena," Koch joked.

The rest of the UMass goals came in the second half as forward Raymond Cunha put on a one man scoring display. Assisted by midfielder Brett Anthony and back Todd Kylish, Cunha netted a cornerkick at 52:54 of the game for the third score, 15 minutes before putting a post shot into the net for goal number four.

Compared to the St. Bonaventure season opener, Koch attributed the scoring barrage to improved passing. "Our passing was much better. It was nice and fluid," Koch said.

"We didn't hold on to the ball as long which made us able to move more effectively," he said.

At 82:14, fullback Darren Stone etched his name on the statistics sheets, booting an Edgerly pass into the netting from 20 yards out at the far post. A hard shot into the lower corner of the net was made possible by the combination of forward Randy Jacobs and Cunha, which ended the scoring at 86:09.

"It was a fun game to watch," Koch said.

In addition to the well executed zone defense, goalie Jonathan Gruber made the weekend sunshine seem a little brighter, opening up the season with two shutouts to his name. Against Siena, Gruber had a total of three saves while Siena's Scott Sylvester accumulated nine. Jonathan Roche also saw some playing time in the final 15 minutes of the game.

In the 1-0 victory over the Bonnies, Gruber barely worked up a sweat as he only had to make two saves in that contest. Bonnie goalie Chris Koons had five saves. The Minutemen had eight shots on goal while the Bonnies had seven.

"Gruber was never tested in this game," Koch said. "I'm not saying that St. Bonaventure is a bad team because they weren't."

Let's not forget who scored the single winning goal. That honor goes to freshman forward Stephen Scott who scored unassisted. Bleau, Anthony, and Pittman also had good scoring opportunities, but could not finish off the plays.

"We tried to use the forwards as targets and run off of them to score," Koch said of the offensive attack.

Tadzhkistan becomes eleventh free republic

By DEBORAH SEWARD
Associated Press

MOSCOW(AP) — Tadzhkistan declared its independence on Monday, the eighth Soviet republic to do so since last month's brief coup against Soviet President Mikhail Gorbechev.

"We can't lag behind other republics. Everybody is declaring independence so we are as well," said Aleyez Abdodezhabad, parliamentary spokesman in the Soviet Central Republic of 5.1 million people.

Eleven republics now have opted for independence, including Azerbaijan, where incumbent President Ayaz Mutalibov won 90 percent of the vote on Sunday in an old-style Soviet election.

The Kremlin has already granted the three Baltic republics of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania their freedom.

Monday's independence declaration by a special session of Tadzhikistan's parliament was largely symbolic, given the decision last week to transform the Soviet Union into a loose confederation of sovereign states.

Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher of Germany said in Moscow on Monday that his country was prepared to establish relations with all sovereign republics in the current Soviet Union.

Tadzhikistan's sluggish response to change after the Aug. 18-21 coup, and opposition charges of intimidation in the weekend election in Azerbaijan show how the predominantly Muslim republics trail in achieving political reform.

Tadzhikistan's parliament also set a presidential election for Oct. 27. Incumbent President Kakhar Makhkamov, elected by the Communist-dominated legislature in December 1990, has kept a tight lid on opposition movements.

A mountainous republic bordering China and Afghanistan, Tadzhikistan has the highest birth rate in the Soviet Union and is one of the poorest republics.

Tadzhik lawmakers, meeting in the republic's capital of Dushanbe, also declared Sept. 9 to be a national holiday known as Independence Day. They renamed downtown Lenin Square to Freedom Square.

Only the Russian Federation, Kazakhstan, Armenia and Turkmenia have yet to declare outright independence from the Soviet Union.

Azerbaijan, with 6.9 million people, declared it's independence on Aug. 30. Its declaration of sovereignity from the Soviet Union in August 1989 was met with hostility from the Kremlin.

Mutalibov's ascent to power accelerated in January 1990, when he was named leader of the Communist Party in Azerbaijan following bloody ethnic violence when Azerbaijanis attacked ethnic Armenians.

In renewed violence this weekend, 13 people were killed and more than 30 wounded in Nagorno-Karabakh, the Tass news agency reported. The predominantly Armenian enclave is inside Azerbaijan.

Opposition leaders in Azerbaijan said they would not recognize the election of Mutalibov, who quit the Communist Party only after last month's bungled coup and the subsequent collapse of the party.

"I am not going to join any parties. I will fulfill the duties of the president based on the law and my likes and dislikes of this or the movement are my personal business," Mutalibov said Monday in a Soviet television report from Baku, the Azerbaijani capital.

Official results of the election were expected Tuesday. Turnout was high - 83.7 percent of eligible voters participated.

UMass alumnus dies

Columnist perishes in auto accident

-compiled from Associated Press reports

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. — Rob Crowley, a University of Massachusetts alumnus and columnist for The New Bedford Standard-Times, died at the age of 34 Sunday morning from injuries sustained in an automobile accident.

Crowley's pickup lost control and flipped several times while he was driving southbound on Route 140 in Freetown.

Crowley, who joined The New Bedford Standard-Times in January 1988, became a columnist two years later and told his readers that he wanted to stick up for the downtrodden.

"Some of you will be angry with what I write," he wrote when he took up the column. "Others will even agree with it. But I've only done my job if you feel something when you put the paper down."

Subjects in Crowley's pieces included a heroin addict who helped save a man from drowning in New Bedford harbor, families fighting neighborhood drugs and elderly people in their waning years.

Before coming to The New Bedford Standard-Times, Crowley was a city editor and reporter at the Transcript-Telegram in Holyoke. He graduated in 1982 with business and journalism degrees.

Crowley is survived by his wife, Kendra A. Pratt, who is also a UMass graduate.

Weekend accident leaves pedestrian in critical condition

By MARK PRESTON

A University of Massachusetts freshman was struck by a vehicle traveling southbound on North Pleasant Street after he wandered into the street late Friday night, Sept.6.

Michael Hearn, 19, an environmental science major, was listed in critical condition at Bay State Medical Center in Springfield at presstime.

The accident occured at 11 p.m., just south of Hobart Lane. The vehicle which struck Hearn was driven by Ernesto Maysonet of 780 Riverglade Drive, Amherst.

According to witnesses, Maysonet was traveling southbound on North Pleasant Street when Hearn wandered out into the oncoming traffic.

Hearn was struck by the left side of the car, splintering the windshield. After the initial blow Hearn was thrown into the northbound lane where he was almost struck by another oncoming vehicle.

Initially, Hearn was rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. He was later transferred to Bay State Medical Center in Springfield.

Maysonet, a continuing education student at UMass, was turned over to the Springfield police on an outstanding warrant. The matter is still under investigation.

Thomas' Supreme Court nomination controversial

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush yesterday acknowledged "there's a fight on" over his nomination of Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court, but expressed confidence that the conservative black jurist will be confirmed.

Bush, meeting with leaders of historically Black colleges and universities, said, "I personally am strongly committed and very pleased with the support that has come out over these last few days for him."

He acknowledged that sentiment among the black educators may be divided, but added, "There's a fight on and I'm confident we're going to win it."

He described Thomas, a sharecropper's grandson who became an appeals court judge, as "a plain, decent fellow."

The Senate Judiciary Committee opens its hearings on the Thomas nomination Tuesday, with opinions divided on whether the confirmation process has become too political.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-PA., says senators have a constitutional responsibility to ask Supreme Court nominees about their ideology.

"I wish it were possible to return to an earlier day when nominees did not even appear," before the committee, said University of Chicago law school Professor Michael W. McConnell. "I think the inquisition is quite unfortunate for the independence of the judiciary."

"The more specific the questions, the worse it is," he said.

Others argue that the intense questioning of a Supreme Court nominee reflects the unique role that the court plays in American society.

"The Supreme Court is not simply a tribunal of justice the way a magistrate's court is," said Professor William Leuchtenburg of the University of North Carolina, who teaches the history of law.

For Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, and others there is no dispute.

"I don't know where Judge Thomas stands on a woman's right to choose," on abortion, he said, "But I intend to find out."

And committee Chairperson Joseph Biden, D-Del., wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that the question of whether the conservative nominee would use his concept of a "natural law" beyond the Constitution to impose a moral code on Americans is "a critical question for the hearings."

SOM profs to teach Soviet businessmen

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Although no one can predict where the Soviet Union will go in the near future, six University of Massachusetts professors will spend this fall helping Soviets try to chart a course for themselves.

UMass School of Management professors Nikolaos Milonas, Alan Robinson, Robert Hopley, Jack Wolf, Robert Marx and Arthur Carlisle will be teaching a series of two-week courses titled "Introduction to Western-style Management" to both starting and experienced Soviet businessmen and entrepreneurs at Leningrad Management Training Center this fall.

Hopley, an adjunct professor at UMass since 1985, said Soviet businesses need to begin implementing many western-style management concepts almost immediately to avoid economic disaster.

"Some of the ideas we are talking about, they are going to have to apply immediately," Hopley said. "Marketing is almost unheard of in the Soviet Union.

"They have such shortages that what gets in the stores is being sold very quickly."

Hopley contrasted many Soviet companies that don't even have marketing departments with American companies such as IBM, which spend as much money on marketing as they do on production.

Hopley said the Soviet's lack of familiarity with marketing and other western-style business incentives is part of the communist heritage of centralized planning.

"There's no idea that you manufacture what gets bought," Hopley said. "The numbers were just given to [Soviet manufacturers]."

Hopley illustrated this by recounting the time he asked a Russian factory manager how the number of products the factory produced each day was arrived at. Hopley said the manager told him the production level was arrived at by dividing a set number by 20, the number of days in a month. That number, in turn, was arrived at by dividing by the number of months in the year.

Because the Soviet Union is in a time of rapid transition, this series of management courses will be part of an ongoing process of integrating Soviet and American management techniques, Hopley said.

"At the moment, we're shooting from the hip — we're going to do the best we can to show how we do things," Hopley said. "We'll plan to teach and see what happens and then we'll refine the courses."

Each two-week course will be taught in two sections. One will be taught to recently graduated Soviet economists beginning work in business enterprises, while an afternoon course will be taught to top managers of various Soviet enterprises.

Hopley predicts that what will emerge from current Soviet changes will be a hybrid of new and old management styles.

"What will come out of these changes will not be a market-driven economy," Hopley said. "In 15 or 20 years, you will see a blend of what we do now and what we'll move into.

"The whole model of a market economy is changing ... the size of government relative to the size of the economy is growing steadily," Hopley said. "[The United States] is growing more centralized, while the Soviet Union is become less centralized."

Funding for Mass schools 45th in USA

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts, home state of America's first public school, now is nearly last in support for public education.

The Northeast's economic woes have brought three years of devastating cuts to schools once considered among the nation's best. Massachusetts now ranks 45th in state aid to education, according to the National Education Association.

The Bay State "was setting the agenda for education," said Education Secretary Harold Reynolds, who has announced his resignation in frustration over budget cutbacks. "All of that is gone."

State aid to public education has fallen form $1.6 billion in 1989 to $1.4 billion in the fiscal year that began July 1.

"Our public schools have now fallen on hard times," Raynolds said in an angry resignation letter, "We fund public elementary and secondary schools and the important preparation of teachers as if there is no future."

More than $376 million has been cut from K-12 since 1989 as legislatures tried to cope with falling revenues. The state budget for this year eliminates another $74 million.

"This will be the third consecutive year that the state of education in September is not going to be as good as it was the preceding June," said Peter Finn, director of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents.

"We've hit bottom," he said, "If there's any optimism, its that there's nowhere to go but up."

With schools increasingly forced to rely on local property taxes instead of state aid, poor communities are falling behind their affluent neighbors in the quality of education they can offer. The state's wealthiest towns spend four times more per student than low-income areas.

"There is no equal education in Massachusetts," said Anthony Degregario, a school administrator in the nearly bankrupt Boston suburb of Chelsea.

Adopt a Highway program underway

Hadley Burger King committed to keeping Route 9 litter-free

By KIMBERLY DIETEL
Collegian Correspondent

Area businesses and organizations are volunteering to help clean up the highways in the state's new "Adopt a Highway" program.

"The most success is right in this area," said Michael Lonergan, the District Highway Maintenance Engineer.

"The program, which began in the commissioner's office in Boston, started in May and has taken off recently," according to Longeran.

He said eight groups are presently signing up now and totaled 18 miles of road. Such groups include area Boy Scout troops and the Burger King restaurants."

"That's about 350 miles of road to be covered in this district alone," stated Longeran. "We've done 18 miles now and there's plenty of territory left."

Open territories that are available include Grant Street in Hadley to the Fairgrounds in Northampton, routes 116 and 9 through Sunderland and Route 63 into North Amherst and Leverett.

The state provides the committed groups with a training course and supplies such as garbage bags and and safety vests. Non-profit organizations who participate receive a blue and white "Adopt a Highway" sign from the state while other groups must purchase it from the state.

Participating businesses and organizations are responsible to clean a designated two mile stretch of road once a month. This is done during April and continues until November.

Jeffrey Lieberson, the assistant manager of Burger King in Hadley, said the program is "strictly volunteer" on the behalf of the managers of the businesses involved. The workers get paid their hourly wage.

Burger King, which is responsible for two miles from University Drive to the railroad crossing on Route 9, usually does their monthly responsibility sometime during a weekday in the late afternoon.

During this time, two managers will go out with six workers. One group will head north and the other south, he said. The participants are responsible for picking up the litter from the curbing 20 feet inward.

"The state has asked us not to go into the street," Lieberson said.

According to Lieberson, comments about the highway program have been encouraging.

"Older customers have mentioned how we're doing nice things," he said.

Lonergan also mentioned about the great response from the community.

Alleged rape reported

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Saturday night at approximately 4 a.m. a 19-year-old UMass student reported to Amherst Police that she had been raped.

The incident occurred at about 1:30 a.m. in the suspect's vehicle after she left an Amherst center bar with two suspects. The matter is still under investigation.

George A. Truran, 1219 Holmes Rd. Lenox, was arrested for operating under the influence on Saturday at 1 a.m. on Sand Hill Road.

Truran indicated he had been hit by another vehicle which left the scene, but was unable to provide a description.

Lorie A. Orszulak, of 16 Brandywine Apartments, Amherst, was charged with leaving a scene of property damage. Orszulak's car struck the left front fender section of a 1979 Chevrolet pickup truck.

The victim was able to get a plate description of the suspect's car and Hadley police were later able to make the arrest.

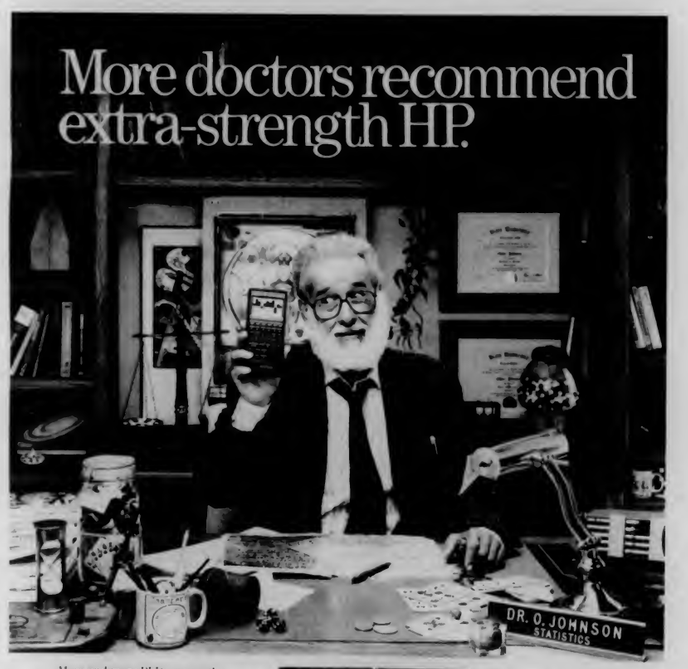
More doctors recommend extra-strength HP.



More and more PhDs across the country are recommending Hewlett-Packard financial and scientific calculators to their students. And for some very strong reasons.

"The HP 48SX Scientific Expandable has powerful graphics tools that are remarkably helpful to students learning mathematical concepts. And with the equation solver feature, it's excellent for applying mathematics to engineering," according to Dr. William Rahmeyer, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at Utah State University.

"The HP Business Consultant II has an equation solver and extensive math functions. These free the students from computational tedium so they can think and interact on a higher level," says Dr. Lee V. Stiff, a professor of math education at North Carolina State University.

So go check out the HP calculator line at your college bookstore or HP retailer. You'll agree, there's no faster relief from the pain of tough problems.

Jail escape 101 in this week's notes

"Hear any good jokes lately?" Boy Pee Wee, don't you have class. There aren't many people out there that would show their faces on that street, never mind on MTV's music video awards after being locked up for "shaking hands with the unemployed" in a porn theater. Sure takes balls — or something like that.

Marc Elliot

While Pee Wee was a close runner up, Eric Ivey gets my vote for Marc Elliott's "foolman" award. Eric tried to escape from a Detroit jail by crawling through an air duct. Unfortunately his pants caught on a metal grate and he was left hanging upside-down from the ceiling until he was apprehended (that won't get any "best chase scene" awards). Now comes the really stupid part. Eric was being held on a traffic misdemeanor, but after his laughable escape attempt, he faces felony escape charges. Lookin' real good Eric.

Just one more award before I get on with this column: The Graffiti of the Week Award. This prize goes directly to Charlie's in Amherst. There's a condom dispenser in the men's room there with the following scrawled on it: "Boy, this gum tastes like rubber."

I'm living in Southwest for the first time this semester. My room has this pipe coming out of the wall for the water sprinkler in case of fire. I'm told that every now and then one of these break, releasing 44 gallons of water per minute. I feel safe. Otherwise, Southwest is fine with me.

Things got pretty weird over there in the U.S.S.R. during that coup, eh? When Yeltsin and his posse were hanging out in the parliament safeguarding the Russian people's right to freedom, I hear they ordered about 300 pizzas. Hey, I can start a political movement with 300 pizzas. Must have been one hell of a tip.

Well the coup's over but Russia's still broke. Soviet leaders are going to have to start using product placement and endorsements to raise money. Maybe Yeltsin can wear Nikes during his next speech or Gorbachev can be the poster child for Clearasil. "When I'm not out crushing military coups and making the world safe for democracy, I use Clearasil to solve my skin problems."

I went to Canobie Lake Amusement Park just before school started a couple of weeks ago. They have this ride there called the "Corkscrew." It's sort of a roller coaster that runs in a circle and actually turns upside-down. The funny thing is that it runs right over the path where people wait to go on the ride. I wonder if the crowd ever gets showered with loose change. I lucked out, though - I got pegged off the head with a Rolex.

Ooo! Ooo! Ooo! Here's a premonition for you. I predict that a physics professor will write in and tell me why inertia would prevent the loose change from hitting the crowd and that I'm perpetuating misconceptions about physics.

Well this is the end of my column, thank God. If you don't like me or have a good joke or even a candidate for the graffiti of the week award, please write me a letter and send by campus mail to: Marc Elliot, Massachusetts Daily Collegian, 113 Campus Center.

Until next week, remember that Nissan commercial: "Even the door handles'll be cool."

I'm a woman; please do not call me a lady

Have you ever looked for a bathroom in a restaurant and found the "men's room" and the "ladies' room," but no room for you?

I have, and I feel it necessary to clarify something publicly so I do not have to repeat myself 20-plus times a day.

I am not a lady. Do not call me one.

Elizabeth Rensenbrink

It is not because I am ashamed that I do not look or act like a lady that I say this, it is simply that I am not one. In truth, I do not know anyone who is.

A lady is tightly corseted, entombed in voluminous flowery material, perched on her seat sipping tea and gossiping. I wear a T-shirt and jeans when I sip tea and gossip; they allow the tummy to expand while enjoying those delicious crumpets that always come with tea.

A lady has to worry about "correct terminology." She "glistens" and enquires to the whereabouts of the powder room. I "sweat" and demand to know where the women's bathroom is.

A lady shows no emotion except while giggling at gentlemen's inane jokes. I laugh with all my teeth showing and become enraged at things like being called a lady.

Historically, a "lady" has been an image constructed by a patriarchal society that women are supposed to emulate: the rich, white lady who doesn't work, talks on only trivial subjects and supports her man in everything he does.

We are expected to uphold it, and yet only a small number of us have the skin color and the money to succeed.

Even if I was in this small percentage, I cannot imagine wanting my waist bound so tightly that I would always have to go to the bathroom and not be able to admit it. I cannot imagine wanting to sit at home and chat about the weather once again when I could be writing cool editorials on how words like "lady" perpetuate women's oppression.

I doubt any woman would want such a lifestyle as that, and yet the term and the subtle pressure of its meaning persists.

I feel I am obliged to come to the rescue of those "lady-labelers" who are stumped over what else to call me. Hmmmmmmm. I know, how about "woman?" I like the word woman: it means I can walk, run, talk about sex, scream, cry, burp, fart and admit to having armpit hair and be proud of it.

So if you have ever received a look that said, "you are a piece of excrement" when you called someone a lady, you now know why that look was justified.

If you have ever received a bladder infection because you could not find the correct bathroom, look for me in front of the empty bathrooms exclusively for ladies if you want to do something about it. I'll be wearing the "Free My Pee" T-shirt. And jeans.

You have the choice to keep your virginity if you want it

Do you feel that if you're in college and still a virgin you're behind schedule? No, sexual experience is not an admissions requirement.

Sometimes it will seem on this campus as though everyone is sexually active except you, but trust me. When condoms are distributed freely in sex seminars or other events, more than a few people are thinking, "Am I the only one here who has nothing better to do with this thing than inflate it?" Virginity is not a thing to "get rid of" or a flaw to cover up. Come up to the present day, folks. Today being a virgin means making a choice, not being unfortunate.

Why should virginity even be an issue? Well, sex is certainly a popular issue, so why not give equal time to the lack thereof? The choice to not have sex is just as important as the choice to have sex.

Alright, the college year has begun. This means hectic schedules, new experiences, meeting people, finding your way around. Being new means being bombarded with a lot of strange faces. It may seem tempting to make one of those faces a lot more familiar, but many of us know that the actual consequences after the fact can be far from friendly. A cold shoulder after a one-night stand can leave a more desolate feeling than having no one pay attention to you at all.

The weekend looms, parties beckon. Everyone is loud and raucous; returning students greet one another like long-lost relatives. You feel a bit on the outs, uncomfortable. But then, a little beer, a warm arm around the shoulder, some whispers in the ear. You feel accepted, a little more secure for those moments, a little bit safer from the lonely feeling a big, strange campus can generate. It can be all too tempting to snuggle in closer and closer.

Brooke Wheeler

Scenario of the past: You think, okay, this is it. I guess it's going to happen. Well, it's not what I envisioned, but I'll have to get it over with sooner or later. I don't want people to think I'm a prude.

Today's scenario: He/she is really nice and good looking, but it's a big no. It's not the right time, and maybe not the right guy/girl. I'd rather wait for someone who means something to me. I have plenty of time.

Yes, of course AIDS and other STDs should be an important consideration, but you shouldn't have to feel you need a medical excuse to abstain.

College-age males in particular may be eager to "rid" themselves of their virginity. I recently overheard one say, "Seize the day. It's only fun when the flesh is young, and we're supposed to be at our peak now." Since when? Peak when you want to peak, not when they say you should peak. This is the kind of nagging anxiety they face. To not be sexually active when you're in college is to waste the "good years". Who needs this kind of performance pressure?

College females are suddenly called women, and that carries with it a certain significance. Women are mature females, and mature females have had sexual experience. Wrong. Women know how to make choices and feel confident in them. Women know that there is no timetable to keep up with. Mature means responsible, not experienced.

If you are a virgin, I hope you feel it is due to choice, not misfortune. You are not part of some small minority that is "behind schedule". You are not a "late bloomer". Think of yourself as a mature, intelligent person who has chosen to abstain or who has not found a suitable partner.

Losing your virginity is not one of the graduation requirements. It's an elective, and like any other elective not everyone takes it, and no one can tell you that you have to register for it. If you think it's unusual in this day and age to graduate from college without having done the deed, then maybe your mind's not really in this day and age.

DEANS LIST

One of the University's highest priorities is its commitment to provide opportunities for academic growth. I am pleased and proud, therefore, to recognize those of you who earned Deans List status for the Spring Semester 1991.

This level of achievement - 3.5 or higher semester average with twelve or more graded credits - is attained by fewer than 20% of the undergraduate student body.

Such outstanding performance is a source of pride to the faculty, staff, your student colleagues, and, of course, your parents.

Thank you for the credit you bring to the University through your achievement.

Richard D. O'Brien, Chancellor

PRESS RELEASES

To publicize your achievement, the University News Office will be issuing a press release to your hometown newspaper if you are a Massachusetts resident. Out of state students are requested to pick up a press release form at 200 Munson Hall (second floor). For additional questions, please call 545-0444.

ADDITIONS/OMMISSIONS

The Deans List was based on grades recieved and posted by the Registrar's Office by August 20, 1991. If you had a grade change after that date (including making up an "Incomplete" or had a missing or late grade recorded after that date), and believe you now qualify for Deans List status, please fill out a form available at the Information Data Bank, 2nd floor lobby counter, Whitmore, and attach verification. Reminder: only graded credits are calculated in determing Deans List eligibility. Pass/fail credits are not included.

■ school funding

Most school districts have instituted extra fees for extra-curricular activities including music and sports and even for bus transportation.

Foreign language, computer, vocational education and gym classes have been cut back or eliminated along with programs for gifted students.

Conditions in some school buildings are Dickensian.

The most current encyclopedia in the Buckland-Shelburne schools dates from 1965 and the history books in Middleboro end with Jimmy Carter's presidency.

There is no money for paper, pencils, chalk or textbooks in many towns. The books that are available often have to be shared. Some districts use scrap paper provided by businesses, a few still bearing the donor's letterhead.

In Newton, once considered one of the best school systems in the U.S., classes are being held in converted storerooms and basements.

Building maintenance has been drastically reduced. In Stowe last year, the health department had to step in and order that the middle school be cleaned.

Many buildings have leaky roofs, missing ceiling tiles, holes in the floors, broken windows, and rutted fields. Lights are left off to save money.

A record 30 high schools were threatened last year with being stripped of their accreditation by the New England Association of Schools and Colleges, many because of the condition of their buildings.

Since the art, industrial arts and music teachers were laid off in the small town of Acushnet, students spend those periods in study halls.

"It is hard to imagine the situation getting worse," said David St. Laurent, a teacher there. "Education in Acushnet will cease to occur."

Raynolds said: "There isn't education now in many of these towns by standards most of us would use to measure it."

This year, he said, "You'll see larger classes, fewer offerings in the way of things like art, music and physical education. Textbooks are not going to be available. There will be very few schools that will have an actual librarian. Teachers will be pink-slipped, many of them very senior people."

"It is going to be difficult to be excited about returning to a school missing teachers, programs (and) materials," said Cynthia Allyn, a teacher in Medfield.

About 3,000 teachers have been laid off in the last two years, according to the Massachusetts Teachers Association. The MTA expects that many more will lose their jobs this year.

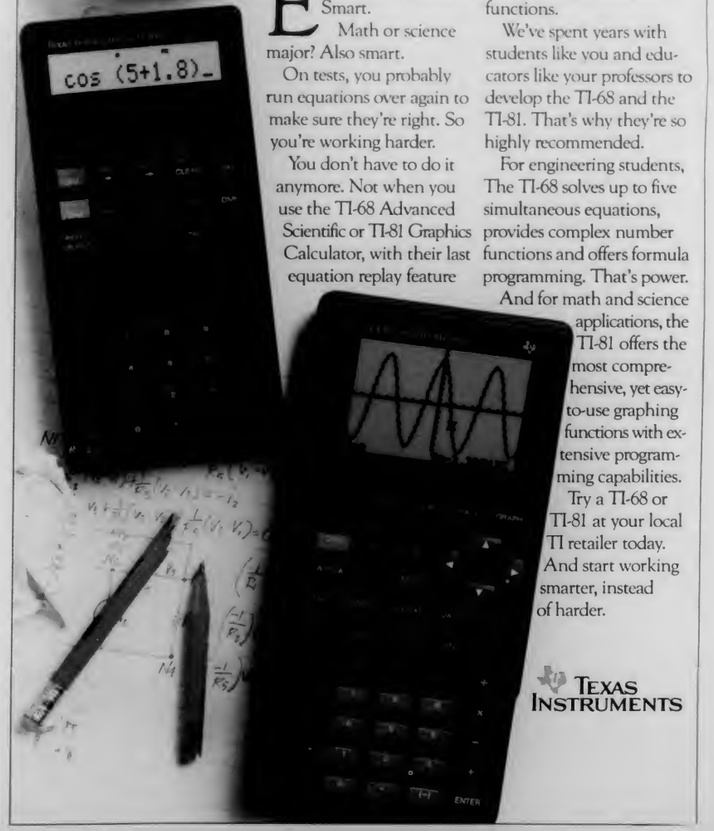
"I didn't cause this mess and neither did the kids, and it's not fair that we're the ones being called on to solve the problem time after time," said Roseanne Bacon, president of the Massachusetts Teachers Association.

Proposition 2 1/2 requires local officials to go to the voters before replacing a leaky roof or broken broiler if that will require taxes to be raised.

More often than not, the voters have said no.

An allocation to buy computers for the high school and restore the jobs of teachers and other town employees in Bourne, for instance, was defeated two-to-one this summer.

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.



Engineering student? Smart.

Math or science major? Also smart.

On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.

You don't have to do it anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-81 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature and so many other smart functions.

We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-81. That's why they're so highly recommended.

For engineering students, The TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, provides complex number functions and offers formula programming. That's power.

And for math and science applications, the TI-81 offers the most comprehensive, yet easy-to-use graphing functions with extensive programming capabilities.

Try a TI-68 or TI-81 at your local TI retailer today. And start working smarter, instead of harder.

Poultry industry faces allegations

By CHRISTOPHER SULLIVAN
Associated Press

The chicken plant fire that killed 25 workers in North Carolina is the latest in a string of problems for the booming U.S. poultry industry, from fraud lawsuits to reports of widespread contamination.

"It is a hazardous industry. It is a poorly regulated industry. It is supercharged with the pressure of meeting consumer demand," said Bob Hall, research director of the Institute for Southern Studies, which produced reports critical of the $21-billion-a-year business.

"I don't think it's an accident" that the fatal fire was at a chicken plant, Hall said.

The fire erupted Tuesday at the Imperial Food Products plant in Hamlet, N.C., when flames from frying equipment ignited oil spraying from a broken hose. Twenty-five workers were killed and 55 injured.

Investigators concluded that locked doors and blocked exits contributed to the deaths. The 11-year-old plant, which had never been inspected, had no automatic sprinkler system. Investigators are considering criminal charges.

A trade organization in Washington, the National Broiler Council, said the fire was "very much the exception to our safety record."

As the popularity of poultry has grown - from 50 pounds per capita in 1980 to 75 pounds this year - so has criticism of the industry. Among the contentions:

● That federal inspectors, hindered by understaffing and a speedup of production lines to meet demand, cannot prevent millions of chickens contaminated with salmonella and other bacteria from going to market.

In one of several major newspaper series on the industry, dozens of federal inspectors told the Atlanta Journal Constitution in May of dirty chickens. The U.S. department of Agriculture seal of approval "means nothing now", one inspector said.

"Public confidence in poultry products is indeed shaken." Lester Crawford, then administrator of the USDA's Food Safety and Inspection Service, said in June.

Kenneth May, technical adviser to the broiler council, said inspectors complaints were part of a "union agenda" to increase the inspection staff.

Though a USDA study found 35 percent of U.S. raised chickens carried salmonella, industry officials said proper handling and cooking eliminate any danger. In a study on the causes of foodborne disease, chicken ranked well below fish and red meat, May said.

● That more than 22 injuries and illnesses per 100 full-time workers have made it one of the 10 most dangerous industries in the United States, according to an Institute for Southern Studies report. Many of the injuries occurred on the cutting line.

Sam Fulginiti, chairman of the Poultry Industry Safety and Health Committee, said better training and the use of metal gloves and other protective gear have improved safety.

● That production workers and chicken farmers get too little of the profits and are sometimes cheated by the plants.

More than 250 contract farmers won a $13.6 million judgment in a 1989 federal lawsuit against ConAgra Inc., the nation's second largest chicken processor. The farmers claimed ConAgra deliberately underweighed chickens.

Judge Myron Thompson called it an example of "the rich seeking to get richer by stealing from those who could least afford to be stolen from."

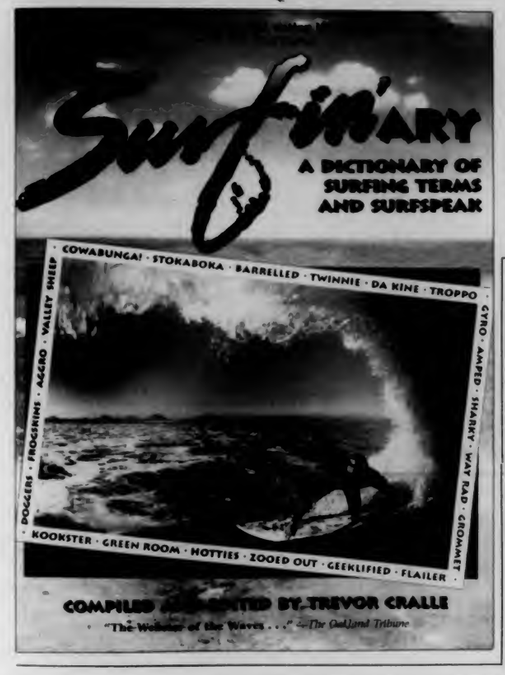
The Surfin'ary goes skeg first but won't fit into your wettie

By JON LUPO
Collegian Correspondent

The Surfin'ary
Trevor Cralle
Ten Speed Press

As the preface proudly states, The Surfin'ary "is the first serious attempt at a complete vocabulary of the surfer and the sport of surfing." Yeah...okay.

The Surfin'ary contains over 3000 surfing terms and phrases with complete definitions. Author Trevor Cralle spent years researching surfing terms in such exciting places as Australia, Mexico, the South Pacific and Indonesia. Too bad he came back with such a pointless book.



Surfin'ARY
A DICTIONARY OF SURFING TERMS AND SURFSPEAK
COWABUNGA! · STOKABOKA · BARRELLED · TWINNIE · DA KINE · TROPPO
KOOKSTER · GREEN ROOM · HOTTIES · ZOOED OUT · GEEKLIFIED · FLAILER COMPILED

It tries to appeal to everyone — surfers and non-surfers alike — but ends up not being worth spending 20 dollars on. It's worth a quick scan, but I'll save you the trouble by picking out the best bits.

The most interesting portion concerned a "surfing versus sex" survey by Wilson-Horchester Marketing Research. They asked the following question to a group of surfers from all over the world:

"You wake up early because you know the surf is going off, but your partner wants to have sex. Do you: A.) go surfing regardless (17 percent); B.) have sex very quickly and then go surfing (77 percent); or C.) forget surfing and spend all morning in bed (6 percent)?"

The report also added that 51 percent of all surfers thought about surfing during sex. Hmmm...Maybe there is more to surfing than I thought.

Anyway, the book rattles on in bland dictionary form, occasionally breaking for a glossy picture of a wave or some surfboard art. The only other humorous (hey — I thought this was supposed to be serious) section contains ten lessons on adapting surfish (surf lingo) as a second language (forget French and Spanish!). It includes such critical rules as: "1.) Always describe waves in terms of cereal ('Hey dude! The inside was crunchy. It gets trea mushy when the tide goes in.') and 2.) In order to save time, abbreviate whenever possible ('We can hit D.T.'s in the whaler. Fresh heiny's in the fridge, bro.')" I'll let it speak for itself.

The question of "why?" kept coming into my mind as I read this book. If you were interested in becoming a surfer, The Surfin'ary is not for you. It's too big to stuff into the back pocket of a wetsuit. (Do wetsuits even have backpockets? Shows how much I know even after reading this book.) Also, think about how much you'll impress the other surfers on the beach (not to mention the babes) when you start looking up words in a book to communicate.

In a cosmic sense, The Surfin'ary is harmless. It may even amuse surfers for all I know. All I'm sure about is that a book which lists the "Ad the Bad Lad and Barney Q. Nietschmann (Department of Geography at University of California/Berkley)" in its list of contributors is either a "geek-a-moo" (page 53) or has been "lip-slamming" (page 69) a little too much lately.

"I used to be a lowly freshman, but then I started working for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Now I'm a lowly junior, but I have a great job, a lot of useful experience, and a lot of cool friends. Thank you, Collegian!"

Northampton Center for the Arts provides stunning dance

By NICOLE GONZALES
Collegian Correspondent

Northampton Studios
Northampton Center for the Arts
Friday, Sept. 6

It was a far cry from the usual faculty dance concert. From the step-sliding styles of James Brown to serene, flirtatious Javanese dancing, Northampton Studios' teachers lit up the stage and had the audience cheering.

Smiling belly dancers, The Crescent Dancers, were decked out in harem pants and sparkling vests. They welcomed the audience with zill (finger cymbals) playing and undulating hip movements. Next, the belly dancing was accompanied by twirling canes which were later balanced on their heads. Then, in a darkened room, figures from an ancient Egyptian temple seemed to come to life with their stiff, angled arms, flat palms and snakelike head slides.

Several modern pieces were presented including a billowy, skipping dancer, Cynthia Jensen, representing the pioneer of modern dance, Isadora Duncan. With high kicks and leaps into the air, this springy, lyrical dancer seemed to celebrate the presence of nature without looking too deliberate.

Heavy drum beats in a Nigerian solo by Felicity Ozoemena Mbanefo drew children out of their seats and into the aisle to dance. The audience clapped along as she stomped in bare feet many times faster than the drum beat. After her pounding feet settled, she focused on the crowd; smiling, as if engaging us in a private joke. Then she'd turn and walk away only to begin dancing again.

The gongs and bells echoing in the Javanese piece performed by Ilene Goldstein resembled underwater sounds. Then a woman appeared in a gold helmet with feathers and a wrapped batik skirt.

She looked like an exotic bird. Her tiptoeing walk and manner of holding her skirt pronounced prestige. With elbows held sharply out to the sides and a tilting head she portrayed the golek puppet from which this dance form was inspired.

Whoops and shouts were heard while male soloist, Eno Washington, stepped to the music of James Brown's "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag". His energetic Afro-American styles recalled a time before break-dancing and the Electric Slide with moves like The James Brown, The Mashed Potato and The Funky Chicken.

In a traditional African number, the same dancer shocked the audience with a high sweeping kick over the head of one of the standing drummers. The entire front row ducked as he dove to the floor and slid towards them on his belly.

The applause in this finale was tremendous. While the drummers and the dancer exited, a remaining boy percussionist stood center stage, eyes sparkling and unable to move. Throughout the cheering, the dancer walked back to the stage; smiled at the audience; smiled at the little boy; put his arm on the boy's shoulder and together they walked offstage.

For information on dance lessons of these and other varieties, contact Northampton Studios at 586-0586.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Traffic conditions may not be what you expected. Have an alternative route in mind. Avoid needless quarrels tonight. Strive to balance self-expression with relationship needs.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): It may be wiser to accept a concrete offer than to rely on an uncertainty. Missing out on a golden opportunity could send you back to the drawing board. Redouble your efforts.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Be specific when making an agreement. A close friend may be too negative for your own good. Walk alone for a while. Overseas studies will help you attain a career goal.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): Bright ideas can be converted into cash now. Travel speeds up a career move. A new romance gives you greater self-confidence. You could find yourself in the spotlight this evening. Live it up!

LEO(July 23-Aug. 22): Too much of a good thing can cause problems. Back away from a confrontation until you have all the facts. A romantic interlude could set the stage for a marriage proposal. Think things through.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Make arrangements to pay outstanding bills and start a realistic savings program. An employment matter can be resolved satisfactorily. Share your good fortune with loved ones. Romance intensifies.

LIBRA(Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Expect some delay in finalizing a business deal or personal loan. It could work to your favor. Answer mail promptly. Travel brings you good luck and opens the door to happy romance.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov.21): Make a realistic plan and then see that everyone follows it. Something that was lost can be found. Your concern over a personal relationship is unfounded. Exercise will help relieve tension.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Better nutrition may be the answer to a health problem. You feel more confident and energetic. Your mate or partner wants to open up emotionally but is still holding back. Offer reassurance.

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan 19): Keep your temper in check and you will win big today. Avoid advancing funds to someone you do not know. Let other people carry the ball for a while. Candid conversations are favored.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Find out exactly what your partner wants. Forgive someone who has caused trouble in the past. Re-evaluating your budget will lead to an overdue revision. A young person feels less tense.

PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): Do not overload yourself today. You will be asked to take on a project you did not anticipate. Your take-home pay increases. Someone feels you have paid your dues. Romance promises new delights.

UMass field hockey shuts out Wildcats

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts field hockey coach Pam Hixon did not think that defense would be a big problem this year. The big question was: Could the new starters, most of whom never even scored a goal last year, provide the Minutewomen with enough goals to win matches?

At least in their opening match Saturday, they scored all they needed as they upset Northwestern University, 1-0, in overtime at Parsons Field at Northeastern.

Sophomore Jenn Salisbury scored her first goal of the year for the Minutewomen, breaking the scoreless deadlock only 3:58 into the extra period.

After two scoreless periods, UMass mounted their attack when senior Dawn Trumbauer passed the ball into the circle to Salisbury, who fired a shot past Northwestern goalie Shannon Small. Trambauer, a second team All-Conference forward last year, recorded the team's only assist for her effort.

UMass was benefitted by the usual solid performance by Junior goalie Philippa Scott. Scott stopped six Northwestern shots en route to her first shutout of the year, and demonstrated why she is touted as one of the top goaltenders in the nation.

Also excelling on defense were senior l-back Joy Blenis, and sophomore Tracy Barclay, who filled the empty sweeper position.

The opening match win had to have a positive effect on the morale of the team, because Northwestern was rated as one of the top four teams in the country.

Neither team took advantage of the penalty corners, as they only mustered six shots each from those corners.

The two teams played in Boston as a convenience to the Northwestern team, who flew into Logan Airport. The Minutewomen have their true home opener Wednesday at 3:30 at Totman Field against Boston College, who will also present an early-season challenge.

The Minutewomen open their Atlantic-10 schedule Friday at home against Temple University.

Tornatore thrown into spotlight

Quarterback's strong performance has Umass fans talking

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Before the University of Massachusetts' football team's season opener on Saturday, Paul Tornatore was number four on the quarterback depth chart and only vaguely known by Minuteman fans.

Yesterday, Tornatore was competing for the starting spot and was being labeled by the fans as the answer to UMass' quarterback woes.

Tornatore took the snaps for the entire fourth quarter Saturday after replacing starter Tom Fasano. In under six minutes of play the senior compiled 170 yards on nine completions in 14 attempts. Tornatore also provided the Minutemen with their only scoring drive, going 69 yards in six plays, ending with a 26-yard touchdown pass to Lamar Newsome.

"Paul's specialty is throwing the ball and in a game like that where we need to come from behind in not very much time, he was very effective," quarterback coach Tony DeMeo said.

Tornatore and Fasano shared the quarterback role in last year's Northeastern game as well after Gary Wilkos went down with a broken vertebra the game before. Tornatore was the designated passer for the Minutemen and threw for 118 yards by completing eight of 16 tosses.

1989 saw Tornatore move to number two on the depth chart. He replaced Wilkos in the Delaware contest and amassed 186 total yards with two touchdowns, including a 25-yarder to Chip Mitchell. Tornatore was named the East Coast Athletic Conference Rookie-of-the-Week.

Tornatore also relieved Wilkos the following week against Northeastern and was 1-1 for 11 yards.

"I would like to start," said the business major. "I would gladly accept the role, but also whatever helps the team."

"Paul is confident and he has all the capabilities to be successful in Division I-AA football," DeMeo said.

However, with Tornatore directing the team, the Minutemen would have to drastically change their play book which relies on an option quarterback such as Fasano.

"It would have to be a different type of running game," DeMeo said.

"The run opens up the pass and the pass opens up the run," said Tornatore, who ran the wing-t offense at Ridgewood (New Jersey) High School.

"We have run blockers on our offensive line," head coach Jim Reid said. "We've got some problems trying to convert to a passing game."

Last Spring, Tornatore reported to camp at 235 pounds, according to Reid. Reid said he told Tornatore to either lose 35 pounds to remain at quarterback or he could gain five pounds and become an offensive lineman.

About the possibility of Tornatore getting the start, he said, "I don't know, we'll have to wait and see. I wouldn't think too much differently than I do now if I got the start."

Football notes: Tornatore had the highest passing efficiency in the Yankee Conference last week, 175.6. All-Yankee Conference outside linebacker Mario Perry will not play in Saturday's game against Holy Cross due to an ankle injury suffered against Delaware. The extent of the injury is not known, but Perry was seen in a cast yesterday.

Water Polo falls to Iona in tourney

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

Failed scoring opportunities prevented the University of Massachusetts water polo team from defending its championship in the Army Invitational Tournament this past weekend as the Minutemen lost to Iona 10-6 in the title game.

Alex Yelensky scored two goals and assisted on one, while Dan McOsker added two scores. UMass goalie Tom Larson knocked away nine shots.

The Minutemen mustered their six goals from 20 shots, while only turning the ball over four times. Coach Russ Yarworth said that potential scores were difficult to come by due to Iona's size and physical play.

"We played good defense but not good offense because we didn't capitalize on scoring opportunities," he said. "Their size forced our offense away from the cage. The players were trying to do it themselves without the team concept."

Yarworth was optimistic despite the loss. "I played a lot of people and took a long look at a lot of freshmen, and some were quite impressive," he said. "I like the way we never quit. We showed good spirit and wanted to win, but we gotta get smarter."

UMass didn't have a first game tune-up as Kutztown St. never arrived. To fill pool time the team scrimmaged itself, but the unexpected rest and lack of game competition didn't prepare them for their next game with Boston College, as they suffered 11 turnovers. Team shooting was on target against the Eagles as the Minutemen missed only eight shots en route to an 11-8 win.

Nice to see fans at the stadium

It was nice seeing you all at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium this past Saturday. Every last 9,527 of you.

Yeah, the hated Blue Hens from Delaware were very rude guests. But a Minuteman win would have been the hot fudge on the ice cream for me. Let me explain.

Ever since I was eight or nine years old, my brother, my father and I piled into the '78 Caprice Classic — a big, blue thing with a 306-V8, back in the days when eight cylinder engines were more of the rule than the exception — and headed off to Amherst for UMass football.

Those were the days of Dick MacPherson and Bob Pickett pacing the sidelines, of Garry Pearson tearing defenses to shreds with his quick, powerful running. Those were also the days of tailgating at Alumni Stadium and big crowds. How big? The visitor's side was nearly full when Connecticut or Holy Cross or Boston College (yes, they played BC) came to town.

As time went on, though, the crowds gradually disappeared. Tailgating became a thing of the past when local and state government got too anal-retentive to let people actually have fun. I could never understand why tailgating was such a big deal, but the smaller the crowds got, the more important it seemed. Does alcohol really mean so much to people that they can't watch a football game without being tanked?

Greg Sukiennik

Saturday's game, then, was a ray of hope for the return of fun to UMass football. The hotdogs are still yummy and the band is as amazing as it ever was, but college football just isn't the same without the fans. It's the fans that give all college sports an edge over the pros, for they bring atmosphere to the game.

If you've been to Foxboro, you know what I mean. Essentially, Patriots games are one big keg party — lots of guys, lots of beer, lots of obscenity and lots of cops to control those drunk, obscene guys — all at a concrete saucer practically in Rhode Island. Atmosphere? You might as well try breathing on the moon.

That's why I was so glad to see the home side of the stadium packed full Saturday against Delaware. There will be even more fans this Saturday, when Holy Cross and their fans make the hour trip down route 9 to the Stadium. See you there...again.

Beating a dead buffalo: Will the media please leave Buffalo Bills placekicker Scott Norwood alone?

O.K., so the guy missed a 47-yard field goal that would have won the Super Bowl for the Bills. Admittedly, as a hardcore Bills fan I've been reliving that moment ever since.

Will the media ever let Norwood live it down? Every damn network has done the same stupid interview with Norwood and his Bills teammates about the field goal. How would you feel if reporters asked you stupid questions about the biggest goof-up of your life, and nothing but that goof-up?

Remarkably, Norwood has kept his perspective about the whole mess — or at least he pretends really well. Some football types would have pulled a Rambo on steroids and ripped the reporters' stupid heads off. I think Scott should've considered it as a deterrent.

Patriots watch — because someone has to: Cleveland 20, New England 0. Hey, only 14 more losses and the Pats get to choose between Ty Detmer and David Klingler in the N.F.L. draft.

All right, I'm sorry Patriots fans. I should give the Pats a break because Dick MacPherson used to coach UMass (see above). But from a warped point of view, losses are good for the Patriots. Losses might persuade Victor "kick me, I'm a moron" Kiam to sell the team. More importantly, losses mean lots of high draft picks for a team still in dire need of talented personnel.

Knowing the Patriots, they'll probably win the whole thing instead.

Pads, pucks and punches: Hey hockey fans, lace up your skates and pull out your false teeth. Training camps are open across the National Hockey League as teams gear up for yet another quest for the Stanley Cup.

Boston has had contract problems galore so far. First, the St. Louis Blues snagged Dave Christian away, so the Bruins went out and snagged Blues defender Glen Featherstone. Meanwhile, the B's have had difficulty signing Glen Wesley. If Wesley stays, though, the Bruins will have found valuable depth at defense.

Featherstone is an interesting pick-up for the Bruins. He's a defenseman in the mold of Brad Marsh or Ulf Samuelson, a physically imposing player with solid checking skills. He also likes to take the gloves off and beat the opposition senseless — a trait that will no doubt endear him to the more bloodthirsty types in the Garden. That dosen't neccesarily impress me. Stupid penalties lose hockey games. Here's hoping his defense balances out with his penalty minutes.

Human rights on comeback in USSR

EDITH M. LEDERER
Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Soviets now say they want world human rights standards to take precedence over national laws as a bulwark against future coups, a principle the Kremlin had called interference during more than 70 years of Communist rule.

Foreign Minister Boris Pankin's statement Monday came as Moscow was preparing to act as host to its first major human rights conference, which opens today.

It was an idea for safeguarding democracy that would have been laughed at here even a month ago.

A woman lays flowers at the monument to victims of last month's coup in Moscow Tuesday as members of the delegation from the Congress on Security and Cooperation in Europe looks on. The CSCE voted Tuesday to admit the three Baltic states as full members.

The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, or CSCE, gives Secretary of State James A. Baker III and the foreign ministers of 34 other member nations their first chance to assess the Soviet Union after last month's failed hard-line coup.

As the conference's first order of business, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia were to be admitted as members, joining every European nation plus the United States and Canada, Soviet officials said.

While the spotlight is on the Soviet breakup, human rights will be reviewed in all CSCE countries. Jeri Laber, executive director of U.S. Helsinki Watch, said "horrible things are going on right now in Turkey and Yugoslavia.

"There are really gross violations of human rights in Yugoslavia, in Croatia. People are being taken as hostages and used as human shields," Ms. Laber said Monday.

"In Turkey, human rights activists are being killed — disappearing Latin-American style that we've never seen before, by people who are clearly death squads."

Helsinki Watch asked the U.S. delegation to raise the Yugoslav and Turkish issues.

Ms. Laber said of the conference, "Everything's changed. Now the heads of half the East European delegations are friends from the human rights struggle. ... and the co-chairman of the Soviet delegation is Sergei Kovalev, a former political prisoner."

Human rights activists said problems remain in the Soviet Union and the republics.

The Helsinki Federation president, Bjorn Elmovist, estimated there are still between 80 and 100 political prisoners as well as people in psychiatric clinics run by the KGB.

Ms. Laber estimated that 50 conscientious objectors are still imprisoned.

Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.), co-chairman of the U.S. CSCE delegation, said he left with Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir Petrovsky a list of more than 100 people who were refused visas and would leave the same list with Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin.

Many were Jewish "refuseniks" denied visas on security grounds. DeConcini named polymer physicist Mikhail Fridman and electronic engineer Solomon Smolyar, who works on MIG jet navigation systems and needs medical treatment because he suffers from Lou Gehrig's disease.

Ms. Laber said that as power shifts to the republics, she expected some governments to be more democratic and some more repressive.

"I'm very fearful that in certain places communism will be replaced by nationalism... and the dictatorial government will continue in the same way, only under a different and much more potent ideology."

Five campus officials nominated for provost position

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Five nominations have been received for the second-in-command position of provost for the University of Massachusetts, according documents obtained by the Collegian.

Nominees include Acting Provost Glen Gordon and Dean of the School of Public Health Stephen Gelbach, who has agreed to be a candidate, according to sources.

Associate Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs Norman Aitken and Spanish Department Head Juan Zamora have not yet confirmed their nominations.

Robert Helgesen, dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources, declined nomination, according to sources involved in the search process.

The search committee consisting of UMass faculty, staff and student leaders issued a call in July for written applications and nominations from within the campus community.

Frederick Tillis, chairperson of the Provost Search Committee, said hiring from within the University community is necessary at a time when the University has experienced a long series of budget cuts.

"The rationale is that the University has gone through such a long series of cuts that it is difficult to recruit someone from the outside," Tillis said. "[The search] will yield someone who has familiarity with the problems here, and if they're experienced, they will have loyalty for UMass."

Tillis, associate vice chancellor for affirmative action and Equal Opportunity, said hiring from within will also ease the transition period, since the new provost will take over sometime in October.

"If the person comes from outside, you have to phase them in gradually," Tillis said. "This way, the person will know the context of our budget."

Candidates for the position may either send a letter of application on their own or be nominated by faculty, staff or students. Nominees must confirm their interest in the position in writing.

Acting Provost Gordon, formerly dean of the Faculty of Social and Behavioral Sciences, is one of five nominees for the permanent position. He was appointed in June when Richard O'Brien left the post to become chancellor.

"I think the search committee will look at other candidates and try to glean who will be the best for the position," Tillis said.

The committee will begin screening applications on September 16. Tillis said the choice would be made sometime in October but was unable to say exactly when. The deadline was extended several weeks to accommodate faculty and administrators who were away for the summer.

The position announcement for provost states that "responsibilities include planning and developing academic programs, fostering the academic growth and development of faculty and students, formulating and executing academic policies, and budgeting for and administering academic programs and related institutional activities.

Senators question Thomas' views during hearings

By RICHARD CARELLI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas went before the Senate Judiciary Committee today, and leading Democrats said they would use his confirmation hearings to question whether he favors a "radical change" in American law including a ban on abortions.

Thomas sat quietly in a packed committee room, his family nearby, as Sen. Joseph Biden pledged "open and fair" hearings. But Biden, D-Del., wasted little time in getting to a topic expected to consume much of the hearings, Thomas' belief in "natural law," a legal theory that some individual rights are inherent and independent of all government authority.

Clarence Thomas and wife Virginia.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, the panel's senior Republican, said Thomas' rulings as an appeals court judge were "within the mainstream" and warned his Democratic colleagues about inappropriate questions.

"Requiring a nominee to pass an ideological 'litmus test' would seriously jeopardize the efficacy and independence of the federal judiciary," Thurmond said.

But Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., told Thomas, "We'll want to know what you really think ... Don't hide behind the argument that you can't discuss the issues."

Thus was the stage set for what is expected to be a lively set of hearings for Thomas, a 43-year-old black conservative nominated to replace retiring Justice Thurgood Marshall, the nation's first black justice.

After each of the committee members gave an opening statement, the proceedings were stopped for a 90-minute lunch break. Thomas was to begin his testifying later in the afternoon.

Even before Biden rapped the opening gavel, Thomas' nomination triggered a confirmation battle more akin to a political campaign of television commercials, endorsements by dozens of groups for and against, and a daily drumbeat of support from President Bush.

Abortion aside, Thomas also is expected to be questioned about his views on civil rights-especially affirmative action-and the right of privacy.

Thomas smiled broadly as he shook hands with Biden and other members of the committee in advance of the opening gavel.

For the most part, he sat quietly at the witness table while members of the committee outlined their views on his nomination.

There was a moment of humor when Biden asked Thomas how old he was. Thomas, 43, replied, "Well, I've aged over the last 10 weeks" since his nomination.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said that while Thomas has never commented publicly on abortion directly,

Progressivity of income tax questioned

BOSTON (AP) — The answer to the question of just how progressive the Massachusetts income tax is depends on who is doing the answering.

"Calculation of the tax burden ration indicates that the Massachusetts income tax is progressive," the state Revenue Department said in the most recent study, a February 1989 report based on 1987 data.

James Braude, executive director of Tax Equity Alliance for Massachusetts, which advocates a graduated income tax, told The Boston Globe that statistics suggest the system, within limits, is "mildly progressive," but "compares terribly with every other state in the country."

Voters repeatedly have rejected a graduated income tax. One opponent of such a tax, Barbara Anderson, executive director of Citizens for Limited Taxation, said, "The concept itself is wrong.

"It's a penalty on hard work and initiative. We look at it as a direct assault on the middle class."

Advocates of a graduated income tax say statistics show that the poorer 20 percent of families pay nearly twice as much of their income for all types of state and local taxes as millionaires.

Most agree that sales and property taxes take a proportionately bigger bite from poorer people's income.

But the Revenue Department statistics show the wealthiest 20 percent of people pay nearly 2 1/2 times as high a percentage in income taxes, partly because of the higher taxes on unearned income, as the poorest 20 percent of taxpayers.

The state tax on most income, including wages and salaries, is 6.25 for everyone, a rate that is scheduled to drop to 5.95 percent Jan. 1.

The tax on unearned income — dividends, other investment income as well as interest from out-of-state savings accounts — is 12 percent.

The state study found that, based on adjusted gross earnings, the lowest 20 percent of state tax filers paid, on average, 2.02 percent of the income in state income taxes.

The highest 20 percent paid 4.87 percent, and the next highest paid 4.01 percent.

Deductions, tax credits, and the higher rate for unearned income account for the difference in the effective tax rate.

The single most important factor accounting for the progressivity of the Massachusetts income tax is the sharply higher rate for unearned income, according to Deputy Revenue Commissioner Jonathan Light.

The wealthiest 20 percent of state taxpayers account for nearly three quarters of all capital gains reported in the state.

Adding to the progressivity of the tax are the $2,200 personal exemption and the rent payment credit of up to $2,500, which, on a percentage basis, do more to reduce the taxes owed by someone making $20,000 a year than someone making $100,000.

People in Massachusetts who earn less than $8,000 and families earning less than $12,000 pay no state income tax.

But, Braude told the Globe, "No matter how you slice it, the failures of the Massachusetts income tax system ranks near the bottom of the whole country."

Scientists ponder second beaching of whales

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Police said 24 pilot whales were found beached this morning at Chipman's Cove in Wellfleet, the second beaching of whales on Cape Cod in two days.

A police officer, who did not want to give her name, said one of the whales died. She said the whales were spotted about 5:30 a.m. today.

Charles Mayo, a scientist with the Center for Coastal Studies in Provincetown, said the whales apparently beached in a marsh at low tide.

"It's a desperate situation," Mayo said, "They're usually stranded in ones and twos, stuck up close to the grass line. These marshes are extensive, and for the whales it's a labyrinth."

Mayo said a large volunteer crew had been called into action and was heading to the site, but he was not hopeful.

"Even with lots of people, you can imagine trying to lift a large group of whales," Mayo said.

Female pilot whales are usually 10 to 15 feet long, with males reaching 20 feet. They can weigh from 2,000 to 4,000 pounds, said Ian McMillan, director of the Cape Cod Aquarium.

In the last 10 years, strandings have never occurred earlier than October. But several incidents on Cape Cod in the past week have left marine officials scrambling for explanations.

Three pilot whales died Monday after beaching themselves in a Brewster marsh. Two others, including a baby, swam into a shallow harbor and became trapped. On Thursday night, 45 whales had to be herded away from First Encounter Beach in Eastham.

Marine officials now fear more could be stranded in the coming days, since large groups continue to be reported off Cape Cod's north shore.

There was speculation that the whales may have come to Cape Cod Bay in pursuit of menhaden fish, which are in abundant supply and are among their favorite foods, McMillan said.

Three adult whales — two females and one male — were found ashore near Crosby's Landing in Brewster just after 2 p.m., officials said. The animals were spread along the marsh about 100 yards apart, said Vicki Corliss, spokeswoman for the New England Aquarium in Boston.

Scientists were forced to euthanize all three when it became apparent they would not survive until high tide.

"Two of them were in very bad shape, badly blistered," said Kathy Bristol, spokeswoman for the Center for Coastal Studies in Provincetown. "One was in good shape, but the tide goes out forever and there was no way we were going to get her anywhere near the water."

A baby, believed to have been separated from one of the two dead females, later was discovered in about three feet of water in Rock Harbor, along with a badly blistered adult male.

Mcmillan said the large whale seemed to be in good condition and workers were hoping to release it in open water if a group of pilot whales could be located.

"But that's not an option with the baby," McMillan said. "What we think was the mother was put to sleep yesterday. The baby has no teeth and is still nursing."

Last Thursday, volunteers in motorboats and kayaks steered about 45 pilot whales to deeper water off Eastham's First Encounter Beach.

A single whale was discovered last Wednesday stranded on Beach Point in Truro, but bystanders pushed it back into the sea.

House may review Rep. Fitzgerald's inheritance

BOSTON (AP) — A Legisltive committee may be asked to review the circumstance under which Rep. Kevin W. Fitzgerald (D-Boston) inherited nearly $200,000 from a woman who sometimes lived on the streets.

The Boston Globe said Tuesday it was told by unidentified legislative sources that House Speaker Charles Flaherty is expected to ask the House Ethics Committee to make the review.

The State Ethics Commission already is reviewing the circumstances of the inheritance.

Fitzgerald is majority whip, the third-ranking leadership position in the House.

Larry Rasky, a spokesman for him, said Fitzgerald was unaware of any plan by Flaherty to seek a committee review.

Nuns sue over Holyoke mall expansion

HOLYOKE (AP) — A group of Roman Catholic nuns has filed suit to stop the expansion of the Holyoke Mall at Ingleside towards their adjacent convent.

The suit filed last week in Hampden Superior Court by the Sisters of Providence accuses the Holyoke Zoning Board of Appeals with exceeding its authority in granting a variance for a proposed 460,000 square-foot addition, that will increase the size of the 150-store shopping mall by 50 percent.

"Our sisters deserve some peace and tranquility after a lifetime of hard work," said Sister Kathleen Popko, president of the 170-member community.

The group's Mother House, including a retirement home for about 100 elderly sisters, abuts a mall parking lot and Popko contends the sister had received verbal assurances from the developers of the mall in the 1970s that they would not seek to expand toward the nuns' property.

However, last month, the Holyoke board granted the Pyramid Company a variance based on economic hardship that would allow it to build a mall addition, housing a new G. Fox department store, 400 feet closer to the nun's property line than the 900 feet allowed under the zoning laws.

John Mason, project director for the Pyramid Company, declined comment on the suit Monday, saying mall owners had not reviewed the complaint.

"But we will certainly defend our position in court," he said.

"That was the only location acceptable to our tenant, G. Fox, and the property is situated such that it is really the only place we could expand."

Popko said the sisters are concerned that the new store and its 1,000-car parking deck would create a "beehive of activity" underneath their windows, which now overlook an overflow mall parking lot.

"To me, the world has sort of come in on us," said Sister Mary Whalen, an 82-year-old retired nurse, who has lived in the mother house for the past 15 years.

There is no question that the sisters were there first. They came to Holoke from Kingston, Ont., in 1892 to care for the poor during a typhoid epidemic and now operate more than a dozen health-care organizations in western Massachusetts.

Their side of the once quiet hill in Holyoke now houses several facilities, including Providence Hospital, Brightside, a home for disturbed children, and Bethlehem House, a rehabilitation facility for teen-agers using drugs.

Two redistricting plans may be done

BOSTON (AP) — The state GOP will have two congressional redistricting plans ready, and will spring one on the Democrats if they don't go along with the other, according to a report published Tuesday.

The Boston Globe said it was told by unidentified Republican sources that the party's strategy is to present a plan aimed at giving it a better chance of winning Congressional seats in the southeastern and western parts of the state and in the Merrimack Valley.

If Democrats refuse, Republicans would threaten to go to court with a plan that would totally redraw congressional district boundaries.

Republicans reportedly would be willing to gamble on court acceptance of their plan and figure Democrats would be likely to want to avoid a court case.

Democrats now hold all of the state's 11 seats in Congress.

"I think there is going to be a legally defensible plan that is going to be particularly harsh from their [Democrats] point of view, but that if you had a forthright judge, could be the outcome," a Republican strategist told the Globe.

Massachusetts will lose one congressional seat as a result of the 1990 census. A legislative committee is about to begin redrawing district lines.

Democrats have a majority in both the state Senate and House, but the final plan also needs the signature of Republican Gov. William Weld, and there are enough Republican senators to uphold Weld's vetoes.

A stalemate probably would result in a court case.

Republicans reportedly believe a decision last week in an Ohio case by a U.S. District Court there provides a legal basis for making Boston one congressional district, helping to clear the way for changes in suburban districts.

What Republicans reportedly would offer before heading for court would involve at least three major changes in districts.

The Democratic stronghold of New Bedford would be removed from the 10th Congressional District. New Bedford provided Rep. Gerry Studds nearly half of his victory margin last year.

A district in the Merrimack Valley would be created with a center in the Lawrence area. It would be aimed at giving a Republican a better chance of victory and enticing former Republican congressman Paul Cronin to run again.

The other changes would be to make one of the two Western Massachusetts districts more Republican and to add more Republican areas to the Central Massachusetts district around Worcester.

Fate of teacher accused of rape of child with jury

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Jury deliberations began yesterday in the rape trial of a special needs teacher charged with seducing one of her 15-year-old male students.

Karen Cross, 33, now on her leave from her job in Tyngsboro Junior-Senior High School, is charged with three counts of rape of a child, for which the maximum sentence is life in prison. She has denied the charges.

There are no allegations of physical force, but the 15-year-old was not legally old enough to consent to the act.

Prosectors contend Cross had sex three times with the teen-ager between Feb. 14 and March 31, 1990. The boy, now 16 years old, was a sophomore at the high school.

In closing arguments in Middlesex Superior Court Tuesday, Assistant District Attrorney Sheila Calkins said Cross relentlessly pursued the student in a quest to "enter his little world."

"He was probably flattered by her interest in him in a sexual way," Clakins said. But the boy ended the relationship when it began to involve his personal life, she said.

"Who was the adult here?," she said. "Who ended it. He did."

Denfense attorney James Dangora questioned the credibility of the boy, saying he changed his story several times while testifying last week.

"He could not tell you who took their clothes off first or what she was wearing," he said.

Dangora also said it wasn't credible that Cross would have told the student's best friend that she was having sex with the teen-ager.

"Mrs. Cross was very open in the relationship," Dangora said. "There was nothing that she was trying to hide."

Cross has testified in the trial that she had only tried to help the student, whom she described as moody and troubled.

"I was determined to help him," she said Monday. "I was never going to give up on him."

Eight witnesses testified in the trial, which began Thursday and included exhibits of love letters allegedly passed from Cross to the student.

Two lines from the letter read:

"God, I wish I didn't care about you so much," and "I can't get you off my... mind."

Prosecutors allege Cross had sex with the boy after luring him to her Tyngsboro home on Valentine's Day 1990 on the pretense of showing him a sports car in her garage.

But Cross said it was not unusual to have students over to her home to work on school-related projects.

"I had students over all the time," said Cross in her testimony. "I was helping a student in need."

Cross admitted she exchanged gifts with the boy on several occasions in 1990, but said she did the same with other students.

Editorial/Opinion

If this is the age of computers, I'd rather have a slide rule

I think it is high time that everyone out there stopped to reflect on how vastly different our lives would be without computers, and I am not just saying that because I own stock in Digital. I am saying that because sarcasm is a sure-fire comedic device.

Now, if any of you are thinking that I plan to pointlessly and unfairly attack every computer in the world, based merely on a couple of inconsequential, sheltered incidents, then let me assure you right now that you are absolutely correct. But, as is often the case when I pointlessly and unfairly attack something, there is nothing you can do about it.

Shawn McDonnell

Today's attack begins within the Tower Library, which is where I found myself for several rather uncomfortable hours this weekend, faced with Saturn, the Disagreeing Cyber. I was introduced to Saturn by Gallileo, which is what my COINS instructor told me his nickname was, in a burst of unexpected openness. "My nickname is Gallileo," he said, "because Conan was already taken." Then he started lecturing.

The main gist of his lecture was that I should get myself a Cyber terminal, and set up electronic mail — thereby enabling me to to pester classmates with unnecessary messages, via computer, at the expense of the University.

This seemed only reasonable, and so it was not long before I sat down at a terminal and logged on to the Saturn system — eventually reaching the point where my notes said I should type the word "mail."

This is where my problems started.

First, the cursor started jumping across the screen. And then, directly below where I had typed the word "mail" appeared the word "maill."

I was naturally dismayed by this response, but nevertheless I was open to suggestions. "Maill," I typed, demonstrating my famous flexibility, but Saturn did not respond. Returning to my notes I double-checked the procedure and repeated it from step one, with strikingly similar results. "Maill," said Saturn. "Maill, Maill, Maill." I could see I was in for a long night.

As it turned out, it was the first really intense argument I've had since the great Am Not vs. Are Too debates of fifth grade, but it's effect was somewhat dimmed by it's predictability — as evidenced by the following quotation:

Me: Mail.
Saturn the Cyber (disagreeing): Maill.
Me: Mail.

And so on. Luckily, I soon tired of talking to Saturn, and after having the last word ("mail") I was able to make it down to the D.C., where I bumped into an aquaintance of mine, whom we shall call Mercedes (not his real name).

Mercedes, who had apparently had a worse day than me, was relating to our table the story of how the ACUS Service computer had set his telephone credit limit at two cents. Naturally the computer had been quite alarmed to see that it had allowed him to exceed his credit limit by nearly 450 percent, by making a nine dollar phone call, and promptly cut off his service.

Though I never bothered to find out, I somehow suspect that to fix the problem Mercedes needed to call one of those talking computer lines, such as the one I called this week after my bank's computer accidently enrolled my in a two hundred dollar travel program.

"You have reached the talking bank line," said the computer when it finally answered the phone. "If you are interested in trips to Hawaii, press '2' on your touch-tone phone."

And though I was finally able to rectify the bank's mistake, via a semi-automatic weapon pointed at one of the tellers, I feel it is only safe to say that not only will I never set up electronic mail, I will probably get in trouble because of it.

"You have failed to meet a course requirement," Gallileo will say. "To find out what your punishment is, press '2' on your touch-tone phone."

Please keep in mind that these events only cover one small week, and that I have not even mentioned my favorite "glitch" of all time, whereby my first computer would automatically create rows of randomly generated characters. I am only glad that my present word processer has survived long enough to bring you this shocking glance into the world of computers. It is time the truth was know3hn^Pkaetrkjahsd;nsvdcn!

New riots, old causes

There have been so many breathtaking developments overseas in the past six months that it is tragically easy to lose a sense of what has been developing in the United States. This past spring, Washington D.C., and more recently Crown Heights, Brooklyn have been engulfed in riots.

Joseph MacDonough

Apart from the initial flurry of 15 second sound-byte reports, there has been precious little said about these incidents. Granted, the national media did make a point of stressing of the African-American vs. Jewish-American aspect of Crown Heights, but there hasn't been much discussion about why the riots happened and what the underlying causes were.

I came across a couple quotes which seemed to have some relevance. "Disorder did not erupt without pre-existing causes as a result of a single triggering or precipitating event..."; "The background of disorder in the riot cities was typically characterized by....disadvantaged conditions for Negroes (sic) especially as compared with those for whites; a local government often unresponsive to these conditions..."

Do they sound reasonable? Maybe even headed in the right direction? Well, they were taken from a report published in 1968 by President Lyndon B. Johnson's National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. Johnson established the NACCD to investigate the causes behind the riots during the "long, hot summer" of 1967, in which over 150 "civil disorders" took place.

The report goes on to discuss some basic causes of the widespread rioting which overwhelmed the nation. Among the major factors were: pervasive discrimination and segregation, Black migration and white exodus from the cities, ghettoes, frustrated hopes, powerlessness and legitimization of violence.

These problems have been pervasive since the 60's and in many areas they have worsened. The recession has brought a great deal of anger and desperation, particularly to the inner city, where Ronald Reagan's cuts to urban funding in the 80's added to the climate of frustration and resentment.

Now it seems to me all the pieces are in place to begin seeing a few long hot summers of our own. The number of "civil disorders" are nowhere approaching the dozens of 25 years ago, but who knows what will happen? Governments and local communities would have to place a great deal of effort, make a lot of sacrifices, and spend a lot of money (yes, money, you G.O.P.'ers — to help improve people's lives, the horror of it all!) in order to start a turnaround.

Then again, it has been politically expedient for the powers-that-be to allow the cities to fester. Nixon ran a racially divisive presidential campaign promising to get tough on rioters and protesters. President Bush was elected by exploiting racial tensions in his little "Willie Hortongate" attack, and he continues to use race as a political tool. For example, opposing the "quota" civil rights bill which outlaws quotas is a fine piece of political sleight of hand.

There are a lot of worms in this can, and with Bush glowing in the McPolitics of polls and approval ratings something tells me it's not going to be opened any time soon. Then again, we could be due for a revolution or two.

I think one final quote from the 1968 NACCD report is fitting: "This nation will deserve neither safety nor progress unless it can demonstrate the wisdom and the will to undertake decisive action against the root causes of racial disorder."

Graph misrepresents fiscal loss

I am writing in response to a "Collegian graphic" which accompanied Marc Elliot's September 4 feature article about UMass budget cuts. The graphic appeared on page 5 and is titled "State Funding for UMass/Amherst Since Fiscal Year 1988 (In Millions)." This graph is misleading, for the intersection of the X and Y axes is mislabeled "($1 M)." How was the label intended to read? Clearly, the intersection point is not "0 M," for if it were, the graph would look very different.

Judging by the scale of the graph's columns, the Y axis seems to range from 100 to 167 million dollars. This "tip of the iceberg" technique is commonly used to visually distort differences. If the graph's Y axis ranged from 0 to 200 million, for instance, the year-to-year budget decreases would not look as dramatic as they do using the "tip of the iceberg" approach. The picture presented by the Collegian graphic portrays a FY92 funding level amounting to less than one-quarter of the FY88 level.

The budget cuts suffered by UMass have been severe and devastating. While I sympathize with the artist's desire to communicate the harshness of these cuts, I prefer less distorted graphics techniques. Collegian readers are intelligent enough to comprehend the enormity of the difference between $167 M and $112 M, whether this difference is represented by half an inch or 3 1/2 inches. The Collegian should strive to present readers with complete and accurate graphic representations of information, not partial and distorted ones. I urge you to offer your readers the whole picture, even if it is not as dramatic as the "tip of the iceberg."

Bush exploiting racism

I remember in 1981, when I was in sixth grade and Ronald Reagan was early in his first term, I asked a classmate what she thought about Reagan. Demonstrating a masterful grasp of complex political issues, she said, "at least he's tryin' stuff."

Steven Feldman

Now I am a liberal, and like most liberals, I detest Ronald Reagan like a sickness. I concede, though, as my classmate pointed out, that he had values. These values managed to come together in the cobwebs of his brain to form a vision, a plan for America. It was something that a James Bond villian would concoct, but a vision nonetheless.

George Bush, on the other hand, has values that extend only as far as the next election. The current civil rights debate and the nomination of Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court exemplifies Bush's gritty determination not to hold any deeply-felt beliefs.

Bush stalled the new civil rights bill in Congress by threatening a veto. Bush and congressional Republicans assailed the Democrat-formulated bill by calling it a "quota bill," that is, it encouraged employers to hire a fixed percentage of minorities, whatever their qualifications, to avoid lawsuits under the new laws. Republicans gamely offered their own "quota-free" bill, but lawyers who specialize in interpreting the arcane language of Washington have said there isn't a dime's worth of difference between the bills.

When you add to this that Bush had the great wisdom to vote against the 1964 Civil Rights Act as a Texas representative, and the way he stirred up white people's fear of Black crime in 1988 with the Willie Horton ad, it's clear that Bush is cynically driving a wedge between the races for crass political gain.

However, Bush is too smart to swing the sledgehammer himself. He delegates that duty to people like Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), who ran a commercial in his 1990 reelection bid showing a white man crumbling a letter that told him the job he wanted went to a "less qualified Black."

It is shocking and depressing that Republicans are using such tactics to woo white working-class voters away from the Democratic party while pursuing economic policies that trample on those same people — who just accept it. In a rare display of courage among the Democrats, Senator Bill Bradley of New Jersey said that he detested Bush for suggesting that working class whites have more in common with rich whites than with their Black assembly-line co-workers.

But the fact is, most Americans react negatively to affirmative action policies when the word "quota" is attached to it. Thus, Bush pastes "quota" on anything the Democrats suggest, even on a compromise bill more watered down than Miller Lite.

Then take Clarence Thomas. Bush trumpets him as the "most qualified" for the supreme court. Yeah, right. As if Bush picked out his resume, called him for an interview, and when he walks in the door, said "He's Black! How about that?"

If Thomas is so qualified, how come he didn't even make the short list of candidates to replace William Brennan, who retired just last summer? Clearly, Bush picked a white to replace a white justice and a Black to replace a Black justice, which ought to be put in the dictionary as the definition of "quota." This is fine with me, because I'm in favor of strong affirmative action policies. But Bush, of course is not — which makes him a screaming hypocrite.

The massive irony in all this is that Bush skewered Michael Dukakis for saying the election wasn't about "ideology, but competence." Bush said "Competence makes sure the trains run on time but doesn't care where they're going." Bush went on to be a time-keeper for the train of history, and he couldn't care less where the train is headed.

Third World Affairs

This summer Americans celebrated the Gulf war victory with the predictable level of humility and restraint. And quite a summer it was, the USA in full glory celebrating what American leader Bush called a "very special Fourth of July." The catharsis of "Operation Welcome Home" seemed almost as enjoyable as the anticipation of "Operation Desert Shield" and the semi-orgasmic spasm of violence, "Operation Desert Storm." The triumph in its modern sense (i.e. military victory) was followed by a series of triumphs in the classical sense (i.e. jubilant parades of the Roman empire celebrating its latest imperial conquest).

Like the triumphs of ancient Rome, this summer's bigger festivities were nationalistic bacchanals of self-congratulation and public demonstrations of imperial might and imperial will. And why not? The "Slough of Self-Doubt" that some people here seemed to feel after the defeat of the United States by North Vietnam, the mysterious "Vietnam Syndrome" (mysterious because it hardly seemed to curtail US aggression and aggressiveness), had supposedly been finally cast off. Reagan's spaghetti western imagery of a nation "standing tall" was deemed to at last have been realized in all its grandeur. How wonderful.

As most readers will be well aware, there were two main parades on the East Coast in early June. They had slightly differing focuses, probably because the two host cities, New York and Washington D.C. wanted to compete over which could be the more spectacular in its patriotic zeal. Washington, as befits the city that is the capital of the Empire, and its center of political power, concentrated its celebration on the military "hardware" that "did the job" in the Gulf. The boulevards of the capital were overrun with tanks, armored personnel carriers, helicopters, and missile batteries, as the blue skies above buzzed with fighters and bombers, for once unlikely to devastate the scene below. It was a thrilling display of might and power in the incontestable form of steel and technology, much of it only recently made public, that delighted the nation. After all, it was due to this technology that so few people died in this excellent war, right? Or at least, so few people who count.

Meanwhile in Iraq (remember Iraq?), the United Nations first observer teams reported that "Nothing we had seen or read had quite prepared us for the particular form of devastation that has befallen the country. The recent conflict has wrought near apocalyptic results." Iraq, it said, had been relegated to "the pre-industrial age." It is probably impossible for Americans to comprehend what this means for the daily lives of the ordinary people in a far off land, which they saw fit to devastate. No water. No electricity. No public services. No sewage system.

The sewage system now empties into the once fine waters of Iraqi rivers, only to be drunk by the populace that lacks any alternate source. They become ill. Horrible disease is amok in Iraq. Epidemics of cholera and diarrhoea (the fatal variety unknown in the West) abound. But, there is also no medicine. Scores die each day. For over a year the people of Iraq have been denied access to food and medicine in one of the most cruel and cynical forms of warfare ever seen. No food. No water. No power. No medicine. No work. They died in their hundreds of thousands, and they continue to die every day that the American people keep them cut off from the necessities of life. But there is no sign of mercy or humanity in sight. The war, and the killing, isn't over in Iraq, not by a long shot. The UN now predicts immanent famine and mass starvation in Iraq.

No food. No water. No power. No medicine. Only death.

Hussein Ibish

But, back to the parade. In New York City, the celebration-of-the war parade concentrated mainly on the troops, rather than the machinery. It was an amazing display of instant mythology. The New York Times could barely contain the instinct for hyperbole and classical allusion, "In the footsteps of Lindbergh, MacArthur, the Apollo astronauts and the American legions home from World Wars I and II, some 24,000 marchers...crossed the Rubicon into history under a deafening tumult of cheering and cascades of confetti and ticker tape." (NYT, 6/11/91, p.A1)

As the troops marched down Broadway, the crowd enjoyed corporate hot dogs and waved free flags issued by Citibank. It was an event appropriately sponsored by many of those corporations that had provided the aforementioned hardware, and others who simply couldn't resist the commercial opportunity, "the biggest ticker tape parade in the history of New York." The public, hysterical with pride and satisfaction at what had been done at their behest, clambered on top of one another to get a glimpse of the new olympian heroes, "There's Powell!! No, wait, it's just a hot dog vendor," was one of the more curious but well publicized quotes of the day. New York bathed itself in rubbish, including 200 miles of ticker tape and 7,000 four-foot wide balloons. "Don't be afraid; join the parade," counseled one wise sage of imperialism. And they did, with an abandon and gusto that leaves little doubt as to the popular sentiment.

And just what was it that was being celebrated? Among other things, it was the deaths of at least 300,000 Iraqis, half civilians, as well as the destruction of the Iraqi nation. The soldiers were starved, bombed, napalmed, fuel-air exploded, choked, and most of all roasted. As they retreated, one of the most foul massacres of an army in retreat in the history of modern warfare was conducted, known as the now legendary "turkey shoot." The Iraqi servicemen were then dumped into unmarked mass graves with no attempt to identify the corpses, or count their number.

If anything, Iraqi civilians fared even worse. Apart from having their life support systems cut off or destroyed, they were mercilessly bombed and tens of thousands died in terror attacks, the most notorious of which being the roasting of those hiding in the civilian bomb shelter.

Even according to the Penatgon, 80% of the bombs dropped missed their targets. What then, did they hit? No prizes for guessing.

But, the most savagely attacked victims of the war have, without a doubt, been the children of Iraq. The Harvard School of Public Health conservatively estimates the number of Iraqi children that will have been killed by the US by the end of the year through either bombing or the slow death of sanctions as at least 170,000. Is it conceivable? Try to imagine it.

One dead baby, lying dead on the ground with its brains bashed out, floating in a pool of its own blood. Ten dead babies. 17 dead babies. 170 dead babies. 1,700 dead babies. Keep seeing it. 17,000 dead babies. 100,000 dead babies. 170,000 dead babies piled high on the White House lawn. A monument to the pride and glory. Congratulations.

It really IS something to celebrate, as it duly was in hometowns across the land on the Fourth. People who have achieved such a victory, at such little cost, deserve to celebrate. It was a really fun summer, a "feel good" time. Of course there were the usual small groups of nay-sayers and blame-America-firsters, claiming that this was "nothing to celebrate." Nonsense! This is a splendid democracy, where the governmental structure faithfully obeyed the will of the people, and the armed forces duly carried out the overwhelmingly popular commands of the duly constituted civilian authorities. What could be more excellent in democratic self-government? After all, a long and open national debate was held, the executive received due permission to act from Congress, particularly enthusiastically from the House, the most popular element in the federal government, and the war remained far more popular than any other public policy issue I have ever seen, scoring in the high 90 percentiles every time. The wise American public understands that sometimes certain unpleasant things need to be done in the greater interest. It was a decisive, democratic system at its very best and a shining example to the rest of the world. And they say there's nothing to celebrate!

So lets all give a rousing cheer for those who so valiantly fulfilled the virtually unanimous national will.

Hooray for the brave men and women of Desert Storm!
Hooray for George Bush!
Hooray for the war!
Hooray for genocide!

1991, the year of the devil: a collage of images

From Baghdad to Havana, Hanoi to Rumallah, from New Delhi to Lima, from the shantytowns of Johannesburg to the hills of El Salvador, a giant noose has tightened perceptibly.

Welcome to the New World Order. Welcome to the Age of America, the Rule of the Robocop.

In their relentless quest to be Number One, the proud citizens of the United States, along with some Third World collaborators, have now achieved the incredible — a military and economic stranglehold over almost all of the Third World. It is open season, and there is no effective deterrent to the Empire, either from within or without.

Global dominance and sellout are the order of the day. Come, join us for a grand armchair tour of the goodies in this truly global supermarket.

The latest challenger to this New World Order, Iraq, had been digitized, pixellated, and vaporized in the most brutal massacre ever in the history of video games. Any twinges of guilt or doubts of remorse about the bloodbath were purged in a self-righteous clamor of support for the hapless pawns in this chess game, the Kurds, culminating in a cathartic fund-raising rock concert. How compassionate, how civilized.

Barely a few hundred miles from Iraq, the Zionist settler-colonial enterprise enters its final stages of realization. A macabre orchestration by Northern imperialist powers, the Israeli apartheid state, and some sell-out Arab leaders, euphemistically referred to in Orwellian terms as a "peace conference," is about to enter fruition. Its purpose — to seal the fate, once and for all, of that irritating and bothersome obstacle to Middle East stability and order, called Palestine.

Of course, those with the bullets and bucks show scant regard for what may be one of the cruellest ironies of modern times — Palestine, a nation which is one of the cradles of human civilization, is about to vanish from the map of the world forever. Until then, the Palestinians will be offered the regular package of brutalities, deportations, and forced settlements.

Meanwhile, several thousand miles to the south, in yet another apartheid state, one of the slickest and most diabolical public relations campaigns of all time enjoys the fruits of its success. South African President President F.W. de Klerk has achieved the dubious distinction of getting almost everything for practically nothing, while seeming to share it all.

As the hypocrisy and shallowness of the North's commitment to the rights of Black South Africans is stripped away, the export of gold from South Africa is given the green signal, South African cricket teams prepare for tours of England and Australia, not one black South African can vote, and a devious hoax which passes as a "constitutional plan" is unveiled. "Apartheid has ended," de Klerk exalts. "We are satisfied," Bush explains. That's all that matters.

Back in this hemisphere, on the very day that the aerial bombardment of Iraq commenced, $42.5 million dollars of U.S. military aid, along with a shipment of A-347 Dragonfly jets and gunship helicopters, was dispatched to El Salvador's U.S.-backed regime. A week later, 15 peasants were massacred outside its capital in its worst human rights abuse since the murder of the six Jesuit priests; the New World Order in El Salvador.

And Granada, where those implicated in the overthrow of Maurice Bishop were sentenced for execution, lest they reveal damaging information which could implicate the U.S. backing of the coup. The invasion of Panama and the merciless ousting of the Sandinistas merely provide an interesting backdrop to this scenario.

Simultaneously, where the Robocop doesn't tread, economic musclepower leads the way. With the pathetic disarray of the Soviet Union and the emergence of a hegemonic Russia, the noose around that pesky backyard weed, Cuba, becomes even tighter. No sooner has the picture of Saddam Hussein disappeared from TV screens than it is replaced by Fidel Castro. The signals are unmistakable. Cuba may have won the Pan-American Games, but it is about to loose the greatest game of all — survival.

As for that persistently annoying reminder, Vietnam, it has been embargoed into economic ruin. And most recently, in India, cohorts hand-picked by the IMF have succeeded in relegating a 40-year tradition of self-reliance and foreign investment restrictions to the dustbin. True, the country is in economic disarray, but any solution so strongly dictated by the IMF (read: the United States) should be cause for apprehension.

"This will lead to weakening of the state structure and bureaucracy," experts say. "We need a healthy dose of incentive." After all, they know what's best. Perhaps the Brazil syndrome is what's destined for India. Till then, non-resident Indians gleefully rub their hands in anticipation of the untold goodies opened up for them by the almighty dollar.

Currently, the West basks in the awesome changes wrought about by the salubrious winds of democracy, freedom, and self determination which are blowing across Eastern Europe and the skeletal remains of the Soviet Union. The Third World shivers in the cold wind of a bleak future to come.

They have learned their history only too well, and only the hard way. It is an ill wind in the North that blows nobody in the South any good. Somehow, these glorious achievements in the North do not bring good cheer, hope, or visions of global solidarity to many souls in the South, thanks to the self-serving agendas of countries like Poland and Hungary, which celebrated their newly won freedoms by establishing diplomatic contacts with Israel and South Africa. The wolfpack just keeps growing and growing.

Meanwhile back at the ranch, U.S. citizens enjoy the fruits of the grandest larceny in history, some proud, others unaware.

Beer and condoms are still seven dollars a twelve pack, "world beat" or "ethnopop" CD's sell for ten dollars each, posters of Mandela crop up all over politically correct institutions, and stores peddling Third World wares spring up in every other town.

On liberal campuses, the facade of diversity and spurious scholarship mushrooms through scores of courses, workshops, and panel discussions, taught by self-proclaimed Third World experts, and expatriates. The Left continues to bleat its tiresome promises of a revolution based on peace, solidarity, and non-violence, potential immigrants scramble around in pursuit of the evergreen card, and area residents partake in such nauseatingly quaint festivities as the Teddy Bear Rally.

God help us all.

AG asked to investigate death

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Legislators called on state Attorney General Scott Harashbager Tuesday to investigate the death of a 2-year-old boy who died while in the care of an uncle who had a criminal history.

Andrew J. Sesselman, 23, of Lynn, pleaded not guilty last week to murder charges in connection with Angel Negron's death. Although he previously had been charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, the boy and his 4-year-old brother were placed in Sesselman's care.

"Once again, state agencies have failed to fulfill their mandates to protect children," said Rep. Marie J. Parente, chairperson of the House Committee on Foster Care.

"We must have immediate reform of the state's child protection systems, including the foster care system, and the child abuse investigation system," said Parente (D-Milford).

Parente, along with committee members Rep. Stan Rosenberg, Rep. Larry Giordano and Rep. Gloria Fox (D-Boston), all former foster children, called on Harshbarger to investigate the state's role in Negron's placement.

Kim Hinden, a spokesperson for Harshbarger, said the attorney general was confident that Essex County District Attorney Kevin Burke was "appropriately investigating" Negron's death.

Parente said Negron's case showed similarities to other abuse cases — violations of foster care licensing and placement regulations, inefficient records, tracking and monitoring of children, and "a complete breakdown in communication and servicing systems that are supposed to safeguard the lives of our children."

"We stand ready to meet with the House committee to ascertain the role we can appropriately play in remedying what is a tragic situation," Hinden said.

Rosenberg (D-Amherst) said the committee requested a formal meeting with the Department of Social Services and Health and Human Services Secretary David Forsberg to discuss the Negron case and the proposed reforms.

"DSS and other state agencies who have been mandated to take care of and protect children... are not taking charge on these reponsibilities," Giordano (D-Methuen). "As a result these children become lost in the system and are set adrift."

An autopsy determined that Negron died of heat trauma, and doctors filed a child abuse report with the DSS. Sesselman told police Negron fell off a bed.

Sesselman and his wife were granted foster care of the boys in August 1990. A DSS investigation revealed Sesselman's history in March, but the boys remained in his home.

Once Sesselman was deemed unfit to care for the children, the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children was responsible for finding a suitable home. The MSPCC said it didn't receive a copy of the report until last week.

In Lynn, Sesselman faces charges of marijuana possession and destruction of property in addition to the assault charge. He also had been arrested twice in Glen Falls, N.Y. on charges of larceny and receiving stolen property.

the nominee once praised a speech that called abortion "the constitutional equivalent of murder."

But Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a strong Thomas supporter, said Thomas should not be forced to spell out his views on abortion because Justice David H. Souter, who won Senate confirmation last year, was not required to do so.

Biden said Thomas would be asked about his belief in "natural law."

Some critics contend Thomas holds natural-law views that could lead to the conclusion that fetuses have a "right to life" requiring states to outlaw all abortions.

"It would not surprise us, nor would it concern us, that either the Ethics Committee or the Ethics Commission is looking into this matter," Rasky said.

"The amount of coverage and the misimpression the coverage has left about this incident would really make any responsible party want to review it.

"He would welcome any review of this matter and is not at all concerned about the outcome, other than he hopes that when all is said and done, that he receives the same credit for not having done anything wrong as he did the suspicion by the speculation that was initiated by the stories."

Fitzgerald got the inheritance from Mary Guzelian, who sometimes lived on the streets for weeks at a time and carried large sums of money in paper bags. She died in 1985 after being hit by a taxi.

Fitzgerald said she asked him for help about a housing problem in 1981 and he referred her to a friend, Michael Muse, an attorney.

Days later, Fitzgerald and Patricia McDermott, then his legislative aide, were named beneficiaries of Ms. Guzelian in a will drawn up by Muse.

Dead prove that good live music is not deceased

Grateful Dead
Madison Square Garden, NY
Sunday, September 8

The Grateful Dead circus arrived in New York City Sunday, where thousands of fans shook their bones to mostly early material.

The streets surrounding Madison Square Garden were packed with wandering tie-die-wearing fans preceding the shows. Many were in search of the illustrious "miracle ticket". One wanted to sell the shirt off his back to get inside. Another offered his second-born child. Hmmmmm. What ever happened to his first born?

The usual shirts, stickers, sandwiches and beads were for sale, including a timely bumper sticker which read, "I've tripped and I can't get down." Hey — would you believe that I was not asked to buy drugs once? Probably not.

Entering the first concert, the excitement could be heard, as voices were naming personal hopes for song selection. "Womp womp womp. Womp womp womp-womp womp. I hoped they'd play 'Shakedown Street'." I felt a strange emptiness and soon realized it was because nobody had frisked me.

The first set included many wonders, including "New Minglewood Blues," "Candyman," and a stunning version of "Big River."

The second set was highlighted by "Eyes of the World", then a Dark star teaser. Making up for their misleading jam, the Dead then made up with the fans by playing "The Other One" and "Wharf Rat". An encore of "Attics of My Life" was marked by great harmonies — Jerry Garcia was in rare form.

On Monday night, the piano section took more spotlight, as Vince Welnick and Bruce Hornsby jammed during many songs. Hornsby playing an accordion was a bizarre sight, but not out of place.

The first tune was "Picasso Moon," which I now have a new respect for, followed by a very welcome "Sugaree." Balloons were bouncing everywhere.

"Looks Like Rain" in the second set drew much applause. Rhythm guitarist and singer Bob Weir drew energy from the crowd and wailed his voice for the ending. After playing "New Speedway Boogie" they jammed, not straying far from the riffs of "Playing in the Band."

After "Uncle John's Band," "Drums" and "Space," the Dead performed a cover of the Rolling Stones "This Could be the Last Time." Then it was "Morning Dew," Jerry Garcia tried to match Weir's vocals from "Looks Like Rain," and managed a few serious screams, with only a few voice cracks.

After the encore of Dylan's "Quinn the Eskimo" the crowd emptied into the New York streets, screaming and clapping the beat of "Not Fade Away." After two fun nights, though, I was still disappointed. There were very few late-seventies tunes. No "Terrapin Station." No "Scarlet/Fire." No "Help/Slipnot!/Franklin." Away I drove, long past midnight, still without the oh-so-anticipated experience of hearing "Shakedown Street." Well, there is always Boston...

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.

Engineering student? Smart.
Math or science major? Also smart.
On tests, you probably run equations over again to make sure they're right. So you're working harder.
You don't have to do it anymore. Not when you use the TI-68 Advanced Scientific or TI-81 Graphics Calculator, with their last equation replay feature and so many other smart functions.
We've spent years with students like you and educators like your professors to develop the TI-68 and the TI-81. That's why they're so highly recommended.
For engineering students, The TI-68 solves up to five simultaneous equations, provides complex number functions and offers formula programming. That's power.
And for math and science applications, the TI-81 offers the most comprehensive, yet easy-to-use graphing functions with extensive programming capabilities.

U.S. women's soccer going for the gold

By ANNE M. PETERSON
Associated Press

MEDFORD — The members of the U.S. women's soccer team are reaching for more than just a world championship. They want the Oympic gold.

"Certainly if there's sychronized swimming, there should definitely be women's soccer," said U.S. Women's Team Coach Anson Dorrance, also coach for the women's team at the Universaity of North Carolina.

"It's a good argument, but not good enough to bring the sport to Barcelona in 1992. First, there has to be a world championship. So the World Cup for women is being held in China this November.

Twelve women's teams are participating in the Federation Internationale de Football Women's World Championship, including the U.S. squad. The next step is a bid for Atlanta in 1996.

"I think for the American public to catch hold of something, a world championship isn't really that significant for them. I think what captures the hearts in women's athletics in the United States is the Olympics, and Olympic success," said Dorrance.

The U.S. team consists of 18 women, most of them college graduates who played soccer in school. They range in age from 20 to 27 and come from across the United States.

Compared to many long-lived European teams, the U.S. women's team got its start relatively late in 1985. In international competition since 1988, the squad has posted 26 wins and 7 losses.

The most recent disappointment came in a two-game charity exhibition against Norway for the New England Sports Museum Challenge Cup. Norway blanked the U.S. team 1-0 in the first game, held in New Britain, Conn. Norway also claimed the second game 2-1 here.

But overall, the U.S. team has made a respectable showing. Dorrance said he doesn't really pay attention to formalized rankings, just team performance.

"All of the amateurs jump in and rank teams. We have to be one of the teams that's considered among the best in the world, but there's a group of those," he said.

Fortunately, Dorrance really doesn't have to worry about rank. Many "amateurs" place the U.S. team in the top three.

Dorrance is also looking to gain worldwide admiration for the women's team, which trains at Chapel Hill, N.C.

"I think we've got a very unique opportunity here. The United States has yet to make an impact in the international game. This team has that potential and it's an absolutely wonderful position to be in because this would give the United States an international soccer respectability," he said.

Many of the players say they are driven to promote soccer, along with women's athletics in general. So far, they seem to be meeting their own demands. Combined attendance at the Labor Day weekend Museum Cup was 10,315, a record for a women's exhibition tournament, according to the U.S. Soccer Federation.

"To me it [the attendance] is a sign of the respect that the women's game has gotten in the last few years. It's really exciting," said Lauren Gregg, the team's assistant coach and head women's coach at the University of Virginia.

Debbie Belkin, 26, who has been with the team since it started in 1985, said it's that exposure that counts, and the exhibition games against Norway gave the program a big push.

"This is great. These people are getting to see high-level soccer and they haven't really before. We go to Europe, where everyone gets to see it, and we get these huge crowds. It's a treat for them," she said.

A ray of hope for our beloved Patriots

I come here to praise the New England Patriots and not bury them under the new natural grass of Foxboro Stadium. Our beloved Pats now share the same record as the defending Super Bowl Champion New York Giants, despite being shut out by the Cleveland Browns on Sunday.

Patriots games have been somewhat taboo in recent years and in all honesty when my season tickets expired two years ago, the re-order form took the route of other junk mail. But this year is different: there's a new foundation being laid, a new beginning, the proverbial "light at the end of the tunnel."

Most of the glow is emanating from the silver dome of new Head Coach Dick MacPherson. Coach Mac was worshipped at Syracuse University not just for his vast knowledge of the game but for the excitement he generated, and in time the same admiration will grow here in New England.

David Scott

CEO Sam Jankovich introduced the business-like attitude the Patriots are entering into, by allowing holdouts John Stephens, Johnny Rembert and Sammy Martin to sit and sweat while rookies and free agents showed that in order to play, you've got to pay. John Stephens was no more important than Cat Stevens in Jankovich's eyes, especially with a future superstar like Leonard Russell in the backfield.

Sure the Red Sox came within a Jeff Reardon field goal of matching the Browns score on Sunday, but the 1991 Patriots are on the mend, having won two of there last three (including pre-season). Perhaps Sunday's game did bring back unpleasant memories of last year's 1-15 season, but this is the new and improved Patriots.

So, with all due respect to David Letterman, here are the top 10 reasons why the Patriots will meet Phoenix in this year's Superbowl in Minnesota:

10) Coach Mac is still alive, whereas both Raymond Berry and Rod Rust (actually the same man) were carrying their death certificates as identification. Mac shows emotion, he headbutts players, he yells at players and he praises players. RayRod BerRust stood motionless on the sidelines, almost resembling down markers, and couldn't decide whether it was better to put Steve Grogan in at quarterback or have mashed potatoes with their turkey.

9) The attempt to bring in a mascot. Sunday's game served as an introduction of a pig-faced duck who needs a name and who will receive one through a contest. The costume was beyond cheezy, probably left over from a past fair at the stadium, but the public relations aspect is divine, showing that even morons like Victor "Foot in the Mouth" Kiam realizes the importance of strong fan support. (My choice for the name, "The Patriot Protrusion.)

8) Cheerleaders. (Men will appreciate the reincarnation of the cheerleaders more easily than women, but suffice to say, it's better than watching the scoreboard during timeouts!).

7) Offensive coordinator, Dick Coury, who has seen all levels of football from the defunct USFL to the NFL. The Pats actually tried a flea-flicker on Sunday, unheard of in the past for fear of surprising the opponent, the pass was intercepted but the concept was incredible.

6) Irving Fryar is a new man, he's outgrown knife fights with his wife, and other such mischief. He's even thinking of becoming a clergyman. Like him or not, he's got the speed and the hands, no Jerry Rice of course, but a fine receiver, just keep him off punt returns.

5) My cousin Herb promises a Super Bowl victory. Herb has been a diehard Pats fan for over 20 years. He actually places a Patriots rug at his feet in order to watch the games. I called Herb for his view on the disheartening loss.

"No problem," Herb said, hiding his true fears. "The 49ers have lost a game, the Giants have lost a game, it happens. We'll be in the Metrodome on Jan. 24."

4) The fans want a winner. Crowd reaction Sunday was amazing for the first half, unfortunately there was also a second half.

3) Marv Cook is a superb pass-catching tight-end, and with the new offense his hands will be utilized.

2) Another season like last year, and the Pats will move; trust me, we don't want to lose our professional football team, we'll never get another one.

1) Doug Flutie will return, throw for 500 yards a game, win the Heisman again (he is a miracle man), and lead the Pats over the Cards 74-2.

Men's tennis drops home opener

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team began its season yesterday on a losing note, falling to Franklin Pierce by a match count of 5-4.

The two squads split six singles matches, but Franklin Pierce edged UMass in doubles competition, 2-1.

Top-seeded Minuteman Paul Audet lost to Franklin Pierce frontrunner George Obidiegwa in three sets, while UMass' No. 2 seed, Tim Lipsky, defeated Jason Forbes, 7-5, 6-1.

In the match featuring the No. 3 seeds, Minuteman Lloyd Teitelbaum knocked off Meholi Belhassan, 6-2, 1-6, 6-4. Franklin Pierce had the winner in the battle of the No. 4 seeds (Hatim Chraibi topped Len Levine, 6-7 (7-9), 6-2, 6-3) and UMass' fifth seed, Keith Murray, made quick work of Clay Richmond (6-2, 6-2). Franklin Pierce evened the singles count at three when Ernest Johnson defeated Steve Davis, 6-2, 6-7 (4-7), 6-2.

The first doubles match saw Franklin Pierce's Belhassan and Chraibi defeat UMass' No. 1 tandem of Teitelbaum and Lipsky, 7-5, 6-0. In the second doubles match, Franklin Pierce clinched the overall match, as Forbes and Obidiegwa bested Audet and Murray, 6-1, 6-4.

Though the match had already been decided before the third doubles match ended, there was some controversy surrounding the final match. UMass' Len Levine, who was paired with David Kleinman, was upset with some calls made by their opponents, Richmond and Johnson.

Levine also complained that Richmond and Johnson unfairly delayed the match in the second set. After a discussion between the players, UMass coach David Rivera and Franklin Pierce coach Don Burness, it was agreed that part of the match would be replayed. As a result, Levine and Kleinman prevailed, 6-1, 6-4, though it did not affect the overall match.

Rivera was pleased by his team's solid effort. He was impressed that Audet, Levine, and Davis (who was playing in his first varsity match), the losers of their singles matches, all took their opponents to a third set. He was also impressed by Lipsky's strong win over Forbes, who last year defeated UMass' top seed at the time, Barry Wadsworth (Wadsworth was scheduled to be top seed again this season, but he was injured during the summer). The men's tennis team travels to the University of New Hampshire on Friday for its next match, to compete against the Wildcats, beginning at 3:00 p.m.

Field hockey hosts Boston College

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

As the University of Massachusetts field hockey team prepares to welcome Boston College to Totman Field at 3:30 today, Saturday's big win against Northwestern fades away in the mind of coach Pam Hixon.

"It's won and done," Hixon replied. "It feels good to open with a win, but we have to move forward and keep on going."

Two young midfielders who stepped their level of play up a notch were sophomore Holly Hockenbrock and freshman Colleen Duffy. "They played exceptionally well against Northwestern," Hixon said.

"Those two kids did a lot, hopefully they gained some confidence."

Also playing well was junior goalie Philippa Scott, who notched her first shutout of the year. Hixon said, "She made the saves she had to make. She kept us in the game until we got rolling."

Midfielder Sherlan Cabralis turned in a solid performance, Hixon said, and she expects more of the same from her today.

Unfortunately, some unanswered questions linger going into today's game against Boston College. Like where will the offense come from?

"We have to find an offensive scheme with more punch," Hixon said. "We didn't have much of an attack (Saturday) until 10 minutes left in regulation.

"We are going to try to get as many people involved on offense as we can," she said. "Our forwards have to be a little more aggressive. Instead of going after the ball, sometimes we just wait for it to come to us."

The Eagles (0-2) are still looking for their first goal of the season, but they have three returning players who can light up the scoreboard. Wingers Allison Corradi, Ann Brisette and center-midfielder Joelle Kozma combined for 12 goals and 10 assists last year. Hixon said she expects that trio to do most of the work on offense.

"When they're on, BC rolls," she said. "If we stop them, we'll stop their offense."

The Eagles offense is more suited to play on their home surface, artificial turf, which is the surface most Division 1 teams play on. Artificial surface allows for more speed in general, and that is BC's strength, according to Hixon.

Kathy Phelan and company will be slugging away today when they host the Eagles from Chestnut Hill at 3:30 p.m. at Totman Field.

Totman Field has a grass surface, and although it is cut to the length of a putting green on a golf course, it is still slower than turf. This should neutralize the quickness of Boston College.

"They're definitely an artificial team, which is to our advantage," Hixon said. "Grass is an equalizer for speed."

Both wingers for the Eagles have a UMass connection: Allison Corradi's brother Steve plays shortstop for the UMass baseball team, and Janet Kozma played field hockey with Minutewoman Tara Jelley at Greenfield, MA.

Hixon said, "We have some real hitters on the team, some real tough kids, so if we get it on goal a lot, we'll maintain control. But if Boston College gains momentum they'll be dangerous."

Men's soccer still on the road

Minutemen at UNH for third straight road game

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Do bus companies provide frequent rider mileage like airlines have frequent flyer rates?

Well, I don't know, but if so then the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team should be traveling for free as they travel to the University of New Hampshire today to face the Wildcats at 1:30 p.m.

The Minutemen are on the third leg of a five game road trip. After New Hampshire, the Minutemen take on Atlantic-10 foe Temple University and then the University of Hartford before returning for their home opener against the University of Vermont on September 21.

"I thought we would be more tired," UMass assistant coach John Guppy said. "After the last two games, though, the team seems to be sharp."

The issue currently at hand, though, are the Wildcats. It is a little early to get excited about being undefeated, but that is what this matchup provides, two unbeaten teams. The Wildcats stand at 1-0-1, while the Minutemen are 2-0 (1-0 in the A-10).

UNH opened their season with a 3-1 win over Iona College on Sept. 7. The Wildcats blasted Iona with 26 shots on goal, while Iona could only surmount seven. New Hampshire freshman Ryan Leib had the hot foot, scoring all three of the Wildcat goals, giving him the team lead in points with six. Niklas Jonsson assisted on two of the scores.

UNH's second game of the year ended in a 1-1 tie with Merrimack College. Wildcat Bill Woods tied the game at 88:37. The goal was the fourth by a freshman this season.

In goal for the Wildcats will be Aaron Agrodnia. In his first two games for UNH, Agrodnia has played 210 minutes, giving up only two goals while saving 16 shots. His goals against average is a mere 0.86. He also has the experience as his career save total is 71.

O'Brien asks SGA to define role at UMass

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

In a letter issued earlier this week, Chancellor O'Brien called on the student senate to take measures that would clarify student government's relationship to the administration and address the reputed ineffectiveness plaguing the Student Government Association. It was this "ineffectiveness" that led to the administration's ill-fated attempt to restructure the SGA last spring.

In the letter, obtained yesterday by the Collegian, O'Brien asks that the SGA "work with representatives of the administration to draft a Relationship Statement," to be submitted to the Chancellor for approval by March 1, 1992.

O'Brien also requests that the SGA "undertake the necessary steps to develop a constitution to be submitted to the Chancellor for approval by the end of this academic year."

If these tasks are accomplished, the letter said, "I am confident that we will be on the road to a productive and enhanced relationship between students and the University."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne Vanin called the letter a means of "setting an agenda for the year" in the area of administration/student government relations.

SGA President David Gagne said that having a constitution recognized by the Chancellor's Office will give the student government more legitimacy in dealing with the administration.

"I see it as realistic [to have a constitution by the end of the year]," Gagne said. "It's not going to be easy, though.

"In the past, the administration has always taken a two-sided view," Gagne said. "When they like what we're doing, they say they recognize us. When they don't like what we're doing, they don't."

The SGA has never operated with a constitution that has been recognized by the UMass Board of Trustees.

O'Brien was unavailable for comment.

O'Brien's letter went on to ask the SGA to "hold appropriate confirmation proceedings for President, Treasurer and Speaker of the Senate."

The administration agreed early last May to recognize the April 9 election of Kevin Newnan as student trustee and Dave Gagne as president. The administration had originally intended to hold elections this September based on the Commission on Student Governance's proposed new governmental structure. The Commission's referendum failed May 9, invalidating the administration's efforts.

O'Brien also called upon the Student Activities Office to oversee that the registration guidelines and procedures for Registered Student Organizations comply with University policy.

The letter then asks for "level funding of RSO's [to] remain in effect until revenues for Fiscal Year '92 have been determined." The Student Activities Trust Fund Planning Committee will begin work on a program statement for FY'93, the letter said.

O'Brien went on to note the initiation of a pilot program to transfer "the financial management of the Area Governments allocation to Housing Services." The program, to take effect this fall, was requested by the five Area Governments of the University.

The letter also states that the "Board of Governors will work with Auxiliary Services to maintain a fair and equitable space allocation process."

Budget shortfall cripples business writing program

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

UMass student Melissa Karydas, a School of Management junior, was upset when she discovered that junior year writing, a class previously required of all SOM majors, was being cut back due to the recent salvo of budget cuts.

"I think it is so bad. It's not fair," Karydas said.

But with a little perseverence, Karydas did manage to acquire an experimental writing course with a limited enrollment.

George Spiro, an associate dean of the School of Management, said budget cuts have taken their toll on the school. When the director of the junior year writing program, Tad Tuleja, resigned last year, Spiro said, SOM began the search for a replacement.

Little did they know that budget cuts would force the school to put the junior year writing program "on hold," Spiro said. The school at this time does not have the funds to replace the empty position.

Now, only a third of SOM majors will be able to take the course which teaches essential writing and communication skills, Spiro estimated. "We are very concerned about our students ability to communicate correctly," he said.

"We need some time to plan what we're going to do next. Give us a little time and we'll teach," Spiro said. He added that the School of Management will need to adjust to the recently imposed budget restraints.

The School of Management is offering junior year accounting majors, and a small number of other SOM majors, an experimental writing course that employs new teaching techniques. Taught by visiting communication professor Jan Harding and supported by two outside grants, this class is only available to a small number of students.

Ronald Mannino, an accounting professor with the School of Management, said the accounting program initially received an Accounting Education Change Commission grant last spring and was followed by a grant by the General Electric Corporation. These series of grants has allowed the accounting program to implement the experimental writing course.

"We were fortunate that we got external funding. We were just lucky," Mannino said. He also added that the cancellation of the junior year writing requirement for most SOM majors is "certainly" temporary.

Harding said 148 students will take the course this semester. The School of Management has offered junior year writing to third year students since 1984, she said, but budget slashes have made it impossible to offer the course to all junior SOM majors.

"That's obviously not what we thought would happen. I sure hope it's temporary," Harding said. "We want to get back on a normal schedule."

Music professor blares his trumpet

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Correspondent

"An engineering student of mine — worst trumpet player I ever had — made the herald for me. He left it right outside my [office] door."

Thus began the tradition of The University of Massachusetts Heralder, Walter Chesnut, a professor of music.

"It's neat to fanfare," he said.

He fanfares for free at UMass. "It's a part of my job," he said.

"I really like this school. I don't want to see the school get hurt," Chesnut said, referring to why he was so active during the faculty protests last spring.

Chesnut said during the faculty strike he "wore a black robe and draped a black cloth over the banner and played taps [on the herald]."

The herald, officially known as the post horn, is contrived of three separate parts. These parts consist of the bell and lead pipe of a trumpet and the middle slide piece of a trombone. The post horn can play only "five to six notes," he said.

Chesnut, a barrel-chested man, came to UMass in 1967 after teaching music at a public school in Michigan for seven years. Chesnut began fanfaring in 1970.

He has fanfared all over the country, from the Peach Bowl in Atlanta, Ga. to every event on the UMass campus.

The elegant banner on the herald is handmade by a parent of a pre-school child who went to Smith School. The school wanted to thank Chesnut for speaking to their children about music.

Chesnut smiled proudly at the banner and said, "Isn't it beautiful?"

Chesnut is a dedicated professor. "Even though I'm not a psychiatrist, I try to help the [students] kids with their problems," he said.

Even Chesnut's lunch hour is sometimes occupied with helping students out. "I worked through lunch today," he told a student. "Two kids had problems."

Chesnut is also a sensitive and compassionate man. His office is wall to wall pictures of family and friends. "All the people I love are up on my walls," he said.

He grew up in Norfolk, Va. His mother who "could play music by ear" started Chesnut on the piano at age four — he "hated it."

His first concert was the Mono Award Music Concert, where he stopped in the middle of his recital to announce to the audience, "I forgot where I was, so I'm going to go back and play it again."

It wasn't until eighth grade that Chesnut discovered his love for the trumpet. "My father gave me a bugle in eighth grade. Later he bought me an old, used trumpet for me to play."

He went on in Norfolk High School to

A loney race to the top
Tsongas seeks votes in New Hamphire

By MATT KOHLMAN
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — Democrat Paul Tsongas sees a glimmer of hope in the reception his campaign booklet has been getting out of late.

"In the beginning, I used to hand out the book and people would take it. Now they want it autographed," says the long-shot presidential candidate. "I've entered the 'just in case'" category.

The question is whether he'll get much further.

The former Massachusetts senator has had the field to himself for months and has been unable to generate much excitement.

He has spent weeks campaigning in New Hampshire and Iowa, drawing a polite, but rarely enthusiastic, welcome.

"It seems dull right now," said Robert Craig, political science professor at the University of New Hampshire. "It's obvious that his candidacy is not such to create headlines all over the country."

Tsongas, who retired from the Senate in 1984 to go home and battle cancer, says his six months alone on the campaign trail have been frustrating but necessary to reintroduce himself on the American political scene.

Now he's anxious for some competition, believing that will draw more attention to his ideas.

"It's been six months trying to blow away seven years of absence," said Tsongas, who regained his health after leaving the Senate.

"It's a fool's errand. I need the other candidates in there."

He's about to get his wish.

Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin plans to announce his candidacy on Sunday, and others are thought to be close behind, including Govs. Bill Clinton of Arkansas and L. Douglas Wilder of Virginia and Sen. Bob Kerry of Nebraska.

Skeptics warn that when others join the race, Tsongas' head-start may well evaporate.

Indeed, Republicans don't spend much time planning for a general election campaign against Tsongas.

"I don't think Tsongas is going anywhere," said GOP strategist Charles Black, and adviser to President Bush.

Tsongas knows that's the conventional wisdom.

But he's betting that his pro-business, outsider image will contrast well with the other Democratic candidates.

Craig and others warn against writing Tsongas off.

He had raised $507,000 through June, the last reporting period, had five full-time staffers in New Hampshire and a few more in Iowa, and counts more than a hundred volunteers in New Hampshire.

Joe Grandmaison, another former state party chairman, said Tsongas also has the advantages of name recognition among New Hampshire's sizable Greek population and of proximity: the state line is a scant five mile from Tsongas' hometown of Lowell, Mass.

Tsongas' strong suit — economics — plays well in a state rocked hard by the recession, and he wants to ride off with the votes by portraying himself as an "economic Paul Revere."

His pro-business platform is laid out in a lengthy booklet, "A Call to Economic Arms," which includes proposals to revamp antitrust laws to let American companies cooperate more, provide tax credits to encourage research and reduce the capital gains tax on some investments.

"I didn't say I'd vote for [Tsongas] but I'm impressed," retired businessman Don Miner, 78, said after a recent Tsongas appearance in concord. "He knocks Democrats as well as Republican, and that's what he's got to do."

Weekend auto accident victim still remains in critical condition

By PRESTON P. FORMAN

The University of Massachusetts freshman struck by a car on North Pleasant Street Friday evening remains in critical condition at Bay State Medical Center in Springfield, said a hospital spokesperson yesterday.

Michael Hearn, 19, an environmental science major, has been in critical condition in the hospital's intensive care unit since the accident late Friday night.

Town of Amherst police speculate that Hearn wandered onto the southbound lane of North Pleasant Street at about 11 p.m. where he was struck by a car driven by Ernesto Maysonet, of 780 Riverglade Drive, Amherst.

Hearn was struck by the left side of the car, splintering the windshield, police said. Hearn was then thrown into the northbound lane where he was almost struck by another vehicle, police said.

The extent of Hearn's injuries are not known. Amherst police are still investigating the incident.

Maysonet, a UMass continuing education student, was arrested on an outstanding warrant by Springfield police.

Weld attempts to counter rising tide of hate-crimes

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON—Gov. William F. Weld announced new guidelines Wednesday for police to use in investigating and reporting hate crimes and incidents.

Assistant Public Safety Secretary Priscilla Douglas and Braintree Police Chief Edward A. FLynn said the guidelines will require police to file separate reports with the state on hate crimes and incidents.

Now, police departments report crime statistics to the state and federal government, but do not break out those where the motivation could be racial, religious, ethnic, or other forms of hatred, Flynn said.

Advocacy and civil rights groups will receive training to make sure the reports are accurate.

Douglas, Flynn, and Bill Johnston, head of the Boston Police Community Disorders Unit, said the additional reporting will help police and other agencies develop ways of combating hate crimes.

Weld, a former prosecutor with some experience in investigating and prosecuting hate crimes, said a strong initial response often will keep hate crimes from escalating.

"Historically we've seen that hate breeds upon itself. Epithets eventually turn into violence and scapegoats become victims," he said.

Weld said the guidelines were being announced at a time when anti-Semitic incidents have been increasing.

"We have an obligation to stop the cycle as early as we can, before the pattern of hate crimes escalates to the point where people's lives are endangered," Weld said.

Douglas said another step will be to prosecute hate crime perpetrators under civil rights laws if that would allow the imposition of tougher penalties.

The new reports will include both hate crimes, actual violations of the law, as well as hate incidents, and act with a bias motive that may not rise to the level of a violation of the law.

The guidelines were authorized under the 1990 Hate Crimes Reporting law, which Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci cosponsored as a state senator.

Douglas said she expects to see a statistical rise in hate crimes because of increased reporting, a move she said will not necessarily mean an increase in the actual number of crimes.

She said the figures will be put in context when they are released publicly.

"We do not want to penalize communities that do a good job," she said.

Sally Greenberg, civil rights counselor with the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, said there has been a rise in swastika graffiti in the past six weeks.

"In the Jewish community, a swastika is more than graffiti. It is a symbol of hate. It is a symbol of of annihilation," she said.

Greenberg said the guidelines provide a good law enforcement tool.

Johnston said those who commit hate crimes are cowards.

"Like cowards, once identified, they disappear into the dark crevices from where they came," he said.

Johston acknowledged that some haters are police officers and said reports about alleged hate incidents committed by police will be included.

Experience your local DC

Starting at about 4:30 in the afternoon each day throughout campus, several thousand students set out on a mission to satisfy their collective hunger. They are embarking on an operation which I have dubbed "the D.C. Experience."

What I never realized in my two years on campus was the utter routine which I subconsciously created to make my "D.C. Experience" uniquely personal.

Todd Kane

Each day, I would begin my deep-breathing exercises about 45 minutes prior to consumption. This exercise prepared my gastro-intestinal system for the long and often times painful process of digesting such culinary masterpieces as "Savory Beef Strudel" and "Roast Top Round of Beast."

With this initial preparation completed, myself and a select group of friends made our way to Berkshire Dining Commons. I can't believe I actually waited in line for food which was almost guaranteed to soften my stool within minutes of consumption.

I found myself eating for the sole purpose of filling my stomach. No matter how nightmarish the food was, I must admit that I became quite attached to the "D.C. Experience." Watching other people became a popular pastime.

If you have ever observed people in the D.C., you may be able to understand what I have to say. Have you ever noticed that some people get six to ten glasses for a sitting? Why? Is this a method of displaying one's D.C. prowess? Perhaps this affects one's height. It seems as though most "multiple-glass people" are all over six feet tall, male or female.

Have you ever noticed that certain people always get salad? Not only are these people in the routine of getting salad, they prepare their salad in the same way each night. These are the people who have seizures if their favorite dressing is missing or depleted.

People's expressions and attitudes always seem to improve ten-fold on a "specialty night" at the D.C. The cartoon bubbles above D.C.-goers' heads can almost be seen with the naked eye. One chap with a sizzling steak above his head. Perhaps a creamy piece of cheesecake above another. One learns to relish the little things when subjected to the normal slop, night in and night out.

However terrible the food at the DC seemed to me when I lived on campus, I sometimes miss the whole experience. When one moves off campus, namely myself, he realizes how good the food was at the D.C. Oodles of Noodles and frozen pizza don't hold a candle to even the worst D.C. dishes. When I think about it now, that roast turkey was pretty good!

Sobering observations about alcohol and life at UMass

"'Cuz if you don't start drinkin', I'm gonna leave." — George Thorogood

I wasn't feeling too happy with myself yesterday morning.

I looked up and it was 9:30. My first class of the day had gone out the window. So had my grand designs of writing this column ahead of time for Thursday's paper.

Why? Because I was out at the Hatch the night before, watching the first Comedy Night of the year and placidly sipping beer. Lots of beer. Too much, in fact.

I had meant to write about alcohol and the way UMass students use it. But when I sat down to write, I couldn't do it. I could barely string sentences together verbally, never mind putting them down on paper. I was loaded. Tanked. Messed up. Three sheets to the wind.

Had I really been betrayed by the golden liquid I held so dear? Or was I just a "lightweight?"

Wherever you live in these parts — be it the concrete jungle of Southwest or the stately little houses of Northeast, the quiet of a house in a residential neighborhood in Amherst or the off-campus party mecca, Brittany Manor — alcohol is sure to follow.

I'm not going to sit here and preach to you about how this campus drinks too much, because I'd be a flaming hypocrite if I did. I'll be the first to admit that a cold bottle of Samuel Adams or a tall gin and tonic are both hard to resist. What I propose to do, then, is make observations about what I've seen and ask why alcohol is so inescapable at UMass.

Can anyone have fun on this campus without getting loaded? If you were at last year's UMass - Boston U. "Midnight Madness" game last semester, you know what I'm getting at. The line outside the Cage was just full of people who couldn't say "when," and they were the ones who turned a line for a basketball game into a cattle stampede.

Greg Sukiennik

Have you ever felt like you were going to be crushed to death? Have you ever been in a crowd so huge that you could barely move or breathe? It wasn't fun. No, it was terrifying. All I wanted was a chance to see Willie Herndon dunk over some hapless chump from BU, and now I was going to die. Wonderful.

On the other side of the coin are our friends over at Housing who seem to have forgotten that Prohibition was repealed in 1933. While one shouldn't forget they have a legal responsibility to make sure alcohol-related mishaps don't happen in the dorms, I think they've carried it a bit too far.

Now I live in the residence halls, and my neighbors and I are all 21. Last time we checked, that makes it legal for us to consume alcohol in this state. Yet, we can't do so with the door open. Why? We're not antisocial. We want people to come in and say hello, and perhaps share a drink or two with us on a Friday night. But if the door's closed, we can't do that now, can we?

Having to close the door makes drinking seem like such a bad thing, and it doesn't have to be. Drinking with the door closed makes alcohol seem like it's illegal, just like it was in Prohibition. We all know what became of Prohibition.

The only way to encourage responsible drinking is to let it out in the open, where people can see it. Not behind some door where your buddies can do 10 funnels and five tequila shots each and get disgustingly sick.

There's one more base I want to touch upon. For all of us who throw back the Rolling Rock from Thursday through Saturday, there's a consequence we don't think of. Maybe it never occurred to us, or perhaps we shut it out of our minds because the reality is too unpleasant.

A co-worker of mine over the summer suddenly disappeared for three days, and nobody knew where he had gone. He is a really good worker and a cool guy, so I was worried.

Sure enough, he came back and explained to us what had happened. Some personal trauma in his life had sent him over the edge, and he'd started drinking again. He was an alcoholic. He would have to go through detox, medical exams and therapy sessions just to make it back. On top of that came the realization that the rest of his life would be a day-to-day struggle to never pick up as much as a beer again.

Could it happen to you or me? Look at that bottle again and think about it.

Housing's new cable system gets 0 stars from columnist

This country is founded on a notion of certain inalienable individual rights. I've been thinking for days that this sphere must include the freedom to choose one's own TV shows.

The reason I've been thinking about this lately is because I'm starting to feel really pissed off about Housing Services' new Cable Network.

Trystan Skeigh

This weekend I was very happy to see Godfather I and II offered back-to-back at 10 p.m. and 1 a.m. on the movie channel, so I settled down in my dorm room with a bag of my favorite cheddar cheese popcorn and a soda to enjoy an evening of Italian-gangster-style blood, guts and gore.

The first problem arose around 10:30 p.m., when my next door neighbors' bucolic festivities drowned out my TV set. (On weekends, posted Quiet Hours don't begin until 1 a.m.).

But I didn't get mad. I just thought, no problem, I'll crank the volume up on my set and close my door. I pushed the button on my remote, and nothing happened. First I thought the control was broken, but, after experimenting, I discovered that all HSCN channels are volume-controlled at a medium-low setting. I could only crank up Channel 57, an off-campus station I sort of get via my little antenna.

So, irritated but determined, I hunched up right next to the TV screen to watch Michael save his father from being knocked off by a rival gang at the hospital. Things were going pretty well, and the action as fast enough that I didn't mind occasionally being forced to read their lips, until around 11:30 p.m., when, right as Sonny was being riddled with bullets at the tollbooth ambush, an HSCN graphic dropped over the scene.

Boom! Suddenly no more movie. And no explanation was flashed over the screen about technical difficulties either. I was left hanging in mid-air with no clue. Godfather II didn't begin at 1 am either.

Now, I'm a fairly reasonable person. Most things about UMass I simply tolerate — like long lines, quadrupling tuition, intra-departmental bull, Health Services' fixation on "viruses" and "ibuprofen", the D.C.'s fixation on food that is either white or brown... But, I consider my after-hours TV viewing sacred.

Part of the problem for dorm residents is that it's not even real commercial cable that's available. It's all in-house programming. Someone at UMass decides what movies will be shown and when. Students are stuck with these offerings, unless we have costly VCR's and big rental budgets, since aerial reception is extremely limited in this valley.

Nobody ever asked me what kinds of movies I would like to see offered, even though I, and every other on-campus resident, has paid a cable fee for the last three semesters.

And that's another thing that sticks in my craw. I paid for cable services all of last year. My dorm got cable in May. All three whopping big channels. And some residents still don't have cable coming to their rooms.

I've come to believe that living in the dorms, or in PC language, "Residence Halls" can be a dangerous thing. People risk becoming homogenized. We all eat brown and white food on schedule, we live in tiny square rooms with too much furniture, we have only certain limited TV programming available, at specified times and volumes ... life is so controlled and regulated it's pretty scary.

Paternalism can be hard to spot when it wears the guise of "special services." Take for example, the new mandatory phone system.

Note that we can't choose to have a phone in our room anymore. Housing automatically installs it and bills us an arm and a leg for it. Also — there's no way we can restrict our calls with this newfangled contraption. Since we all have been assigned voice mail, we are always accessible. The phone may not even ring, but that irritating little red light will flash until we acknowledge our message.

But I think the cable network is even scarier. Someone besides me is controlling the offerings and the times. If I could, I would like to rig my own antenna and disconnect from UMass cable all together, but it's illegal for dorm residents to crawl around the outsides of their buildings, and God knows I don't want to be "written up".

A poster floated around Butterfield Dorm last semester that read: "You Report To Be Reprogrammed at 0800 Hours. This Is For Your Own Convenience And Safety."

I used to think this sign was only a joke. Now I think maybe it's a warning.

New student program vet recommends experience

For many of you, the first time you drove up to the University of Massachusetts campus was for the New Students Program. Cringing at the enormous buildings, you arrived carrying only your sleeping bags, a change of clothing and stomachs filled with butterflies.

Felice Cohen

What many of you didn't know was that for those two and a half days you spent on campus, you were being prepared educationally, socially and morally on how to survive and to survive well at UMass. Though what you probably remember more was not getting too much sleep, having to take a bunch of placement exams and those crazy-always-filled-with-energy-counselors constantly directing you on where to go.

What you may not have realized during the program or while driving home exhausted, was the amount of preparation that went into making sure that your first encounter with the University be a positive one for both you and your parents.

Now that's where I come in.

Imagine being paid to spend two months of your summer meeting people your own age, preparing fun indoor and outdoor activities, and making close friends — all the while receiving free room and board and health coverage.

Sound to good to be true? Well, this is exactly how I spent my summer and I will vouch for every word.

This summer I was a counselor for the New Students Program, and since most of you went through the same type of orientation, you probably remember some of the jobs the counselors did, for our responsibilities were many. From the early morning wake ups (anyone remember two off-key female counselors singing "Cheeseburger in Paradise" at 6:30am?) to giving tours of the entire campus (anyone remember a tour guide wearing fish pajamas?) to explaining "Gen Eds" ("Who can tell me what CAS stands for?"), our days were regularly packed.

Still, the jobs I did were not what I left Amherst thinking about when the orientations ended. The summer was for me, and 30 others, about discovering oneself and their capabilities.

My main purpose here is not to have you recollect memories of your orientation, but instead to make you aware of what a golden opportunity it is to be a part of the New Students Program.

This is one of those experiences not too many people are fortunate enough to have. Meeting new people, making close friends and becoming comfortable enough to speak in front of crowds of people, are just a few of the benefits one comes away from this job having received.

But being a New Students Counselor means a lot more.

Our summer was spent introducing UMass to over 4000 students and their parents. As counselors it was imperative that we all had at least one certain criteria in common, that we all truly loved UMass.

The staff was made up of all sorts of people; artists, engineers, athletes and actors who came from hometowns as far away as Puerto Rico, Israel and California. We were as diverse a group as one can get here at UMass, yet together we worked as one solid team.

Having the opportunity to meet all sorts of interesting people enabled me to learn and understand about others who were different from myself. Despite all these newfound qualities one receives from this job, the truth is that those qualities were always there. It just took the opportunity of the New Students Program to search them out.

So does this job compare to waiting tables? Teaching four year-olds how to make pictures with pinecones? Or ringing up produce at the local supermarket? If not, (and from having done all those jobs in previous summers, I know they don't), I feel that working with the New Students program was the best experience I've ever had.

The real purpose of being a New Student counselor is to make the incoming students feel good about UMass and really look forward to coming back in the Fall. By the looks of things (and the lines prove you've returned), it seems that the New Students Program was yet again successful.

Students to Collegian: report on all deaths in campus community

We are writing in response to your recent article about the death of Laurin Aycox. We would like to know why only select members of the UMass community receive obituaries. Ms. Aycox was an active student on this campus and she died a terrible, accidental death. However, there have been other tragic deaths of students and professors which you have not mentioned.

Last November, during the Thanksgiving break, a student named Jennifer Geertz died. An obituary was never published. As a result many of her friends did not find out until several days after her death. Several weeks later when a memorial service was held at the Newman Center, there was no announcement in the Collegian. Jen was an active member in the Theatre and COINS Departments who brought a lot of love and laughter to those who knew her.

In addition to this oversight; at the end of last semester Theater Professor David Knauf died of a heart attack exactly a week and a half before his retirement. There was no mention of his death in the Collegian. Again, there was not an announcement of the place or time of the memorial service.

Both of these people had an important place on the UMass campus. They both meant something to many other students and professors. Yet neither of them received an obituary in this paper. Every death is a tragic death, whether it is from an accident, a murder, a heart attack, or an illness. Something can be learned from every death, to value life. Therefore if the Collegian is going to announce deaths, announce them all. Because everyone is important to someone.

Hey* Collegian *columnists — we've got some bad news.

The* Collegian *open house is being postponed for a while. Details are unavailable at this time, but what this means is that the scheduled meeting of columnists is off for now. However, don't let that stop you from bringing submissions to 113 Campus Center. Keep those letters and columns coming...

Article did not consider facts about cholera

When I picked up this semester's first issue of the Third World Affairs page, I expected to read the usual anti-American polemic supported by distorted facts and vanishingly small amounts of hard data. Needless to say, I was not disappointed. Mr. Ibish in his article "Hooray for Genocide" described people as expiring from "cholera and diarrhoea (the fatal variety unknown to the West)." A little cursory research would have turned up the fact that diarrhoea is a symptom of cholera, that all cholera can be fatal, and that it has been a presence throughout Western history and a scourge to urban society even in the Victorian Era. I refer you to Dr. Elison Harris' "Cholera Prevention: Examples and Practice: A Note on the Current Epidemic in New York City," published in 1892!

What perhaps is more disturbing is Mr. Ibish's mysterious silence on points that weaken his position, specifically the fact that Saddam Hussein's regime has the power to curb this epidemic, but refuses to do so. Cholera is primarily spread by drinking water contaminated with sewage. A simple preventative measure is boiling the water to render it potable. The regime has hindered the World Health Organization's efforts to educate people on this issue. If the government there was really concerned with the welfare of its populace, they would release the estimated sixteen tons of chlorine gas stockpiled as chemical weapons in violation of the cease-fire agreement. Chlorine gas is used in many countries, even in the US, to sterilize drinking water. Of course, if Saddam Hussein had cared about his people, he never would have initiated the invasion of Kuwait and permitted his people to suffer for his megalomania. [Pathologic data: Cholera, ed. Dr. Dhiman Barua, 1974]

Writers believe "lady" not an offensive term

We wish to address your call against "Lady Labelers" (Elizabeth Rensenbrink, Sept. 10). before we "lady-labelers" indulge ourselves in airy persoflage, may we define the word "lady" in what we believe to be the proper definition. First of all, do you believe that such a dignified show as "Mister Rogers' Neighborhood" should address Lady Aberline as Woman Aberline? I doubt that you, Elizabeth, would address Lady Diana as Woman Diana, burp with her merrily, discuss sex while farting and measure each other's underarm hair.

Contrary to your beliefs Elizabeth, many women still regard being called a "lady" as a true compliment. I know for one that when someone calls me a gentleman, I do not take offense or feel oppressed.

When I think of a lady I picture a refined woman, one who is smart, independent, assertive and composed — someone who I cannot help but admire. Historicaliy, a lady has been a revered individual who is admired by all. We know, Elizabeth, deep down, beneath all this bitterness you have the ability to be a great lady of the ages.

After all, what would history be without these famous ladies: Lady Elaine Fairchild, Lady Macbeth, Lady Godiva, "The Lady in Red," Lady Guinivere, Lady Fingers, "Three Times a Lady," "My Fair Lady," Lady Luck and of course Lady Bug.

Professors ask flyer author to restrain from racist actions

We are professors in the Department of Mathematics and Statistics and we are Jewish. We are extremely disturbed by the report in the Collegian on Friday, September 6, 1991, concerning the appearance of the fliers around campus threatening to hold "Hillel and the Jewish community responsible for any threats, misquotes, slander, or acts of violence against Dr. Leonard Jeffries, Jr."

If the writers of the flyer feel that they have been victimized by racism, what a pity that they have to engage in anti-Semitic racism themselves. We urge the campus community to be vigilant about such outrageous statements in the future. Dialogue, not confrontation, will allow us to address the problems of our society in a constructive way.

This Weekend

The Eastern States Exposition

THE BIG E

By PAUL DEGEORGES
Collegian Staff

Have you finally got all of your classes added, dropped, paid for and started? Has the stress of these first couple of back-to-school hell weeks started, and got you walking around, jittering, pulling out your hair and generally wondering if you can actually handle this whole college experience?

Well, relief is on the way. The 70th annual Eastern States Exposition (The "Big E") is here. So this weekend, instead of roaming around with thousands of people getting ulcers from their classes, the obscurantism of UMass beaurocracy and the general craziness of the whole Happy Valley, you can roam amongst the thousands of people at "New England's Great State Fair" getting ulcers from too much fried dough, ferris wheels and the aggravation of winning an Aerosmith mirror (when you really wanted the Guns 'n' Roses one).

This year's fair is being touted as "bigger than big" and from now until September 22nd you can escape from any hint of academia to the big thrills, big name musical acts, a big top circus, big draft horse shows and big (BIG) rides at West Springfield, Massachusetts' most entertaining yearly event — The Big E.

Featured this year will be free live shows at the Miller Genuine Draft Stage including country legend Loretta Lynn; former Supreme Mary Wilson; country rockers the Charlie ("devil went down to Georgia") Daniels Band; passionate country crooner T. Graham Brown; American Music Award winner Patty Loveless; the Osmond Boys; and the Motown-famous Marvellettes.

Of course, the most traditional symbol of the whole fair is probably the Big Top Tent which will be the location of all sorts of spectacular trapeeze artistry, annoying clowns, people riding elephants and sticking their heads in lions' mouths, dancing bears and all the rest of that wonderfull flashy and endearing stuff.

As always, there will be those guys who drive around on two wheels and jump over barrells in souped up race-cars. The Big E will feature one of the most famous of these acts — the Joie Chitwood Thrill Show.

The prestigious Eastern States Equestrian Horse Show will showcase some of the finest horses and riders in the country. From Saddlebreds and Morgans to Harness and Hackney Ponies, the horse show will also include a special display of hunters and jumpers, and draft horses.

Well, I could go on listing all the events and activities that will go on at the Big E, but the list might become tediously long and run into the nifty graphics on this Weekend cover, so suffice it to say, they don't call it the Big E for nothing.

If school is making you feel a little zany or if you live in town and all those wacky college students are making you clausterphobic: take a break and go to the Big E.

It's like Shawn Cassidy once said, when refering to the hectic moments in his life: "The trick I suppose, is not to take them so seriously that they can make me go bonkers."

The Big E, from now until the 22nd — it's not that expensive and it's definitely worth it. Heck, you might even see Shawn there.

The Ellen James Society: don't be Reluctant

By AMY B. FINKELSTEIN
Collegian Staff

So you say you know what's what. You say you know what you like and what you like is where it's at. Good.

So you know that the Ellen James Society is hot. You know that they began three years ago and are from Georgia — that Athens/Atlanta thang — and that they toured with the Indigo Girls this past summer.

EJS performed on Nomads, Indians and Saints, the Indigo's third Epic LP on the gut wrenching track "1,2,3," so it should be no surprise that their debut album, Reluctantly We, was produced by Amy Ray of the Indigo Girls and released last October on Daemon Records, an independent songwriters' label created by Ray, and to further the point, both Amy Ray and Emily Sailers appear on Reluctantly We on both studio and live tracks.

That's not to say that the Society are dependent on the Indigo scenario. Actually, the only resemblance is in the intensity factor. The music is intense. It has feeling. It's not that jingle-jangle pop. Though steel guitar oriented (Chris McGuire and Cooper Seay), there is a huge R.E.M.-esque bass feel (Bryan Lilje) and a kickin' post-punk back-beat that will make your arm hair stand on end (Scott Bland).

"We're kind of a train wreck between simplistic melodic ideas and complex rhythms," says McGuire.

Aggressive, impassioned vocals inflecting emotion (McGuire and Seay) on top of deep, sometimes dark melodies and chord progressions, the twelve songs on Reluctantly We depict a vast reservoir of pain and absolution. The voice of passion, if ever it could be captured.

"As day begins to night we stumble through our fright/ and wonder just who we might be." — "Who We Might Be"

"Tell me how do you make love last/and I'd give you more than you've ever had/what's it called when love turns bad/ and I am me and I am you and nothing in this world is true." — "Fodder for the Song"

The band shares in the writing, according to McGuire, and "what really happens is we start jamming at a sound check and then try to do that at a series of sound checks, which is like a series of 10 minute incidents. It's a very difficult way to create, so if someone has a really strong vision about a song, we'll try it that way. Most bands don't write that way, but then, we've never been afraid to fall on our faces, so to speak. We just play what we play and don't worry about whether people are going to like it."

So you know that the Ellen James Society don't compromise their ideals. And you know that they're playing a free show on Monday the 16th, so no excuses.

The Ellen James Society is what's what. I guess I'll see you Monday. Save me a seat up front.

Religious Seriously Ill is a haunting art exhibit

By MELISA CANLI
Collegian Staff

The oppressive heat is the first thing you feel when you walk into the gallery. The show by third year MFA student Ed Grant is titled "Religious Seriously Ill"—Installation without redemption. It is difficult to describe the feeling the small room evokes. There are not many items in the gallery. The heat, which may or may not be intentional, works very well to set the atmosphere. The closed windows and tightly drawn heavy draperies cause the stuffy warmth as well as the many exposed lights. The first striking piece is a large wooden cross splattered with blood-red paint and a Virgin Mary statuette at its base. Grant uses what resembles rounded fishbowls filled with liquid as symbols. The bowl attached to the cross is filled with more red paint.

Framed images are scattered around the room in disproportionately small frames compared to the large wooden planks used as backdrops. Their size forces one to peer in order to scrutinize further. In the center of the room, a large wooden ladder reaches to the ceiling. It sits on a dark pool that acts as a reflection pool. When I reached in to touch it, I realized the origin of the smell accompanying the heat. The pool is filled with motor oil which emits fumes that make your head spin if you stay in the room to long. Alongside the ladder, on the floor are two long slabs of wood. On one side the words "deny" and "faith" are illuminated by bare lightbulbs suspended from the ceiling by cords. On the other side are the words "desire" and "guilt". Grant states that he invokes Catholic motifs to raise these ideas.

At one corner of the room is a wall adorned with wooden bars with pieces of what look like sheet metal attached to it. Each sheet contains a Roman numeral, from one to ten, to represent the ten commandments. At the opposite end is another fishbowl which is filled with a mysterious substance. One of the comments in the log book up front was that the person liked the "brains in the bowl". As I continued to observe the installation, I overheard some art majors who enlightened me as to what was in the bowl, Wonder bread and wine. It is not a pleasant sight.

One of the most interesting aspects of Grant's work is his use of sound and light to create the mood. There are many bright, hot lights, and a constant stream of music that is flooded into the room from speakers set into wooden boards on the wall. The music is very eerie, with menacing laughter and occasional sirens. Most people seemed to comment that the show was very disturbing. According to Grant, his work is influenced and derived from his own Catholic background.

The exhibit will not suit most mainstream tastes. Yet, its success is a result of the interesting materials used to construct the exhibit and its sync with its title. You will probably feel a little ill when you walk out. It is worth a few minutes of your time when you're walking through the Student Union, to stop at the gallery and take a look for yourself. Grant will have two more shows installed this year. The second will be at Greenfield College Nov. 5 - Dec. 1. His MFA thesis exhibition will be at UMass in the Spring of 1992.

The Student Union Gallery is open Mon-Fri from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. The installation runs through September 13.

Les Teles serve burning hot Afro-pop at Horse

By NICOLE GONZALES
Collegian Correspondent

Les Tetes Brulees
Iron Horse
Tuesday, Sept. 10

"This music is different than anything I've ever heard!" said a bug-eyed intellectual dancing at the front of the stage. The primeval rhythms of Africa had transformed the mellow, candle-lit Iron Horse cafe to a frenetic hall of experimental dance — and that was just the audience.

The band, Les Tetes Brulees, called Africa's first punk rock group, appeared in slashed T-shirts, baggy patchwork knickers, partially shaved hair and body paint.

They all sang either together harmoniously, or each belted it out in their own unusual voice from gruff, raspy tones to yet another that sounded like he'd been sucking too much helium. Throughout their singing and playing, they put on an ad-lib show of knock-kneed swaying, hand waving and mimed soccer moves.

Like switching a radio dial, the rhythms were impatiently ever-changing. Each springy guitar lick and creeping bass line was better than the last, travelling in its own maze of sound. The synthesized marimba (African xylophone) echoed the high guitar tones while reflecting the original instrument, the balafon, that this rhythm was traditionally played in the rainforest region of western Cameroon.

Their sound, "Bikutsi Rock", was formed as a reaction against dominant African dance music — soukous from Zaire and Antillean zouk, which is more clean-cut, both in appearance and in the melodies. Stripping away the pretentions of these forms, Les Tetes Brulees leave out their usual horn section, fancy backing vocals, and smooth sirupy crooners.

Using ancient Bikutsi rhythms while flying through the usual soukous-style loops, they come up with something more varied, more folky, and as last night's concert proved, refreshingly anti-boring as a roller coaster ride through outer space.

Les Tetes Brulees was one of the Iron Horse's Afro Pop music series that includes Papa Wemba on Thursday, September 19th at 7 p.m. and Kanda Bongo Man on Thursday September 26th at 7 p.m.

"I don't want to play music only for Zaireans any more," said Papa Wemba, a superstar in Zaire. "I am going to do music for all of humanity."

Wemba's music is a blend of Zairean traditional music and Afro-Cuban rumbas, popular in the 1950's, along with hints of more contemporary reggae and disco.

His music, which he calls rumba-rock, is more varied and more soulful than the bright three chord melodies of soukous.

"When I started singing pop music," says Wemba, "I left religious music completely. But there was always an influence ... because with religious music, the minor key always recurs.

Displaying a fashion sense directly opposing that of Les Tetes Brulees, Wemba has walked onstage in a heavy leather coat with diamond patterned sleeves. "But with such jubilant music," says The New York Times, "no one would mind if he wore polyester plaids."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): If the spirit of cooperation is missing, it may be wiser to proceed on your own. Relying on undependable people could cause a setback. Avoid issuing ultimatums. Stress spiritual will power over bullying.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): The morning hours are best for negotiations. A secret conference could help you realize a fond dream. Your energy will soar this afternoon. The social scene is getting livelier. Dress your best.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Start the day with an entirely new attitude regarding your prospects. There is a lot you can accomplish this month. Set specific goals for yourself after consulting with experts.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Stay footloose and fancy-free in romance. A newcomer will question your approach to business. Find novel ways to get your original ideas across to higher-ups. Work more closely with your associates.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Only you can decide what is right for you now. Just remember, seeking revenge is a waste of energy. The time is right for making a permanent commitment. Forget past grievances.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Take note of what has to be done, then do it. Conduct a thorough investigation. Talking to the right people will further your professional aims. Be on the lookout for new career opportunities.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Get an early start today if still doing your shopping. Putting your personal plans into operation will give your spirits a lift. Have more confidence in your abilities.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): If others try to force their opinions on you, politely decline to listen. Be willing to start at the bottom to get your foot in the door. Seek a car loan without delay.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Keep your own counsel if planning to change jobs. Update your resume and enroll in high-tech classes. Do not withold your love if upset with that special person in your life. Talk things out.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Wake up to your special talents and abilities. Help to reconcile two friends who are at odds. It is futile to spend your time on people who do not want to grow. Seek greener pastures.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Stay excited about the future; success rests in your hands. Acting suspicious of a loved one could damage your relationship. Master your own feelings instead of trying to control loved one's actions.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Put your faith in your partner and see what happens. Adopting a new lifestyle may be a good idea. Listen closely to what your children are saying. Certain changes are way overdue.

NFL

With Dan Hampton retired, the Giants should have little trouble controlling the line of scrimmage. This will be the first big test of the season for both Giants quarterback Jeff Hostetler and Coach Ray Handley. The Giants running game will outlast Chicago's, give the 1 1/2.

One of the better lines this week is Buffalo by only 7 1/2 over the New York Jets. Jim Kelly is coming off possibly the best game of his career against a tough Pittsburgh defense. The Bills have scored 87 points in two games while the Jets have accumulated a mere 29, not to mention that the Jets lost to Seattle last week. Bet the house on the Bills.

The pick of the week is San Francisco giving 2 1/2 points to the Vikings. Minnesota gave up 439 yards last week to the Falcons while the 49ers amassed 458 yards against the Chargers. San Francisco is tough on the road and Steve Young found Jerry Rice nine times last week as opposed to once vs. the Giants.

The worst game of the week has got to be "The Battle of the Bays", Tampa Bay at Green Bay. Unfortunatley, we have to be subjected to this game twice a year. The Packers are favored by four yet they have only scored 17 points in their first two games. So, if the Buccaneers score a touchdown, they should have no problem covering.

The Monday night game looks to be another good one. Kansas City is off to a slow start and if they expect to contend for the Super Bowl they must win this game.

The same holds true for Houston. If the Run-and-Shoot is going to make it in the NFL, it's going to have to beat the better defenses like Kansas City.

Houston's offense is off and running. Can anyone stop them? They've scored 77 points in their first two games while the Chiefs have managed only 24. The Chiefs are too good to be blown out, but the Oilers should be able to cover the spread.

Here are my picks (in CAPS) for the week: Take the STEELERS (-13 1/2) vs. Pats, DALLAS (-3 1/2) vs. Eagles, BEARS (+1 1/2) vs. Giants, BILLS (-7 1/2) vs. Jets, BENGALS (3 1/2) vs. Browns, WASHINGTON (-9) vs. Cardinals, LIONS (+1 1/2) vs. Miami, 49ERS (-2 1/2) vs. Vikings, TAMPA BAY (+4) vs. Packers, ATLANTA (+2) vs. San Diego, RAIDERS (-7 1/2) vs. Colts, DENVER (-6) vs. Seattle, SAINTS (-3) vs. Rams and the OILERS (-4) vs. Chiefs.

Field hockey routs Boston College 5-0 in home opener

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team controlled their home field yesterday, crushing Boston College 5-0 in their 1991 home opener.

The Minutewomen (2-0) were led by a pair of goals each by Dawn Trumbauer and Jenn Salisbury and strong offensive support by the whole team.

UMass dominated most of the first half, as they scored their first goal less than five minutes into the match. Winger Holly Hockenbrock shot the first goal past BC goalie Marilyn Huang, which put the Minutewomen ahead 1-0.

Trumbauer drilled a long shot in with 15:43 left in the half, and that was the last of UMass' goals until the second half. The opportunities were abundant, as UMass kept the ball in BC's half of the field for most of the first 35 minutes.

Meanwhile, the Minutewomen were well on their way to a blowout because goalie Philippa Scott was in the process of pitching her second straight shutout. She made saves on the few balls that got past sweeper Tracy Barclay.

Coach Pam Hixon felt her team "absolutely" dominated Boston College yesterday.

"We were around their goal [the whole game]," she said. "The biggest thing we were trying to do was to create, to get something."

UMass failed to score on 10 penalty corners and one penalty shot against an inferior team.

"We had some great chances... we've got to now start to capitalize on them," Hixon said.

In the second half, UMass played solid on both sides of the field, as BC tried to mount a comeback. The outcome was never in doubt, though, and when Salisbury scored twice in less than a minute, the game was iced. Her goals at 11:58 and 11:00 grounded the Eagles for good.

Trumbauer added her second goal of the day with five minutes left in the game, yet lamented about the lost opportunities the team had.

"Going from turf to grass is difficult, but once we get used to the turf, things will definitely connect," she said.

One of the disappointments in the game was the team's play inside the circle, according to both Hixon and Trumbauer. The Minutewomen got bogged down inside when the players charged into the circle after the ball.

"In the circle we need to work on opening it up a little more," Trumbauer said. "I think we worked the ball really well outside of the circle today."

Tara Jelley, Sherlan Cabralis and Salisbury each had an assist for the Minutewomen.

Hixon said, "They all played well. When you dominate a team like this, consistently, your defense is doing something right."

Game notes: The Minutewomen open their Atlantic-10 schedule against rival Temple University Friday at home. Temple is traditionally strong, as they beat UMass twice last year, both in the regular season, and the A-10 Tournament. Hixon expects a tough game, and does not expect a letdown from her team.

"It's our first conference game," she said. "We're not trying to look ahead, and we're not trying to look behind. I think that they are very strong. But just like any other game we have to fight from start to finish."

Roy's picks for week three in the NFL

Don't look now, but here come the Dallas Cowboys. Despite losing 33-31 to the Washington Redskins Monday night, the Cowboys showed that they are back as America's Team. Monday's game brought back memories of the stunning Cowboy victory over Washington on Monday Night Football during the early 80's. The Skins led 23-3 at the half when Dallas stormed back for a 31-30 victory.

Dallas may have won last Monday if star running back Emmit Smith wasn't ill. Smith ran all over Washington, gaining 100 yards by the second quarter, including an incredible 75-yard touchdown run. Troy Aikman completed 9 of his first 10 tosses and threw 3 TD passes. Tight end Jay Novacek picked apart the defense for one TD and a few key third down receptions.

But credit this game to Washington place kicker Chip Lohmiller, who connected on four field goals of 53, 52, 45 and 46 yards. This enabled the Skins to stay in the game until they finally pulled away late in the third quarter with an almost nine minute drive that resulted in a TD.

In the end it was Cowboy betting fans who got the last laugh as Dallas scored with two seconds left to cover the 2 1/2 point spread.

Sorry Patriot fans, but if you thought the Pats looked bad last week against that stunning Browns defense, wait until they play a real defense in Pittsburgh this week. Look for the Steel Curtain to unload on poor Tommy Hodson and the rest of the sorry Patriot offense. If Pittsburgh scored 34 points against Buffalo, how many points do you think they'll rack up against New England?

Don't worry about the 13 1/2 points, that won't be a problem after the first quarter.

Watch for the Cowboys to bounce back from last week's tough loss, this week against Philadelphia. Don't think Dallas has forgotten about last Thanksgiving when the Eagles put bounties out on several Cowboy players including Aikman; or when the Eagles ruined the Cowboys' chances of making the playoffs by injuring Aikman in the second to last game of the season.

Now that Randall Cunningham is out for the year and "Old Man" McMahon is the QB, the Eagles pose little threat, especially after only managing 10 points against the lowly Cardinals. 3 1/2 points shouldn't be a problem.

One of the better games to watch should be the Chicago Bears at home against the New York Giants. The Giants have had problems stopping the run since pre-season. Chicago's All-Pro running back Neal Anderson should bounce back after a sub-par performance this past weekend.

Women's tennis set for rematch with UConn

By LILLIAN LEGGIO
Collegian Correspondent

In their last meeting, the University of Massachusetts and the University of Connecticut battled it out in an enduring match that ended in heartbreak for the Minutewomen. With the two teams tied at four matches, the deciding game went down to a last set tiebreaker. UConn squeaked by to win the tiebreaker 7-6 and subsequently the match 5-4.

This year, the Minutewomen look to reverse last year's outcome with a victory of their own. They travel to Storrs today, realizing that the task of beating UConn will not be an easy one.

UConn contends with an attack that last year finished 5th in the Big East and this year has already defeated a tough Wesleyan team 8-0.

In addition to their already tough lineup, the Huskies have added freshman Bethann Barry who was one of two top recruits for Umass last season. However, when the women's tennis team was cut from the athletic department's budget, both top recruits sought alternate tennis programs.

"Bethann Barry is an excellent player and I'm very happy that she's got a quality program to play for," said Coach Edwin Gentzler.

According to coach Gentzler, the Huskies have a good, solid team that plays great doubles but the Minutewomen have an advantage in singles because they are stronger and have more depth. However, he cites that the Huskies are not to be underestimated.

"Ellen Barrett, their No. 1 player, is very strong," Gentzler said. "I'd say she's the best player in Division III and in New England."

Last year, Barrett handled Shizuko Yamasaki, UMass' No. 1 player. However, according to Gentzler, Yamasaki has matured and improved her mechanics.

Mechanics on the other hand, are what Connecticut Coach Pat Babcock says her Huskies need to work on. Babcock asserted that while her team won its first match, the team has been working on setting its lineups and rankings and neglected mechanics.

"Don't let the UConn Huskies fool you. They are a well coached team and I don't think they have any problems on mechanics or on being competitive," Gentzler said. "This will be a very hard fought set of matches, but that is what makes women's tennis so interesting."

Cross country gearing up for Friday's meet

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team opens its 1991 season Friday in a tri-meet against Boston College and the University of Massachusetts/Lowell. The race will be run over the Franklin Park course in Boston and will begin at 3:00 p.m.

Boston College won the meet last year, scoring 31 points. UMass placed second with 44 and Lowell finished third with 56.

UMass head coach Ken O'Brien feels that his team will be "hard pressed" to duplicate last year's results.

"We're not starting out with two easy teams," he said. "Boston College will be one of the top five teams in New England this year and Lowell should finish as one of the top three teams in the NCAA in Division II."

BC will likely be the team to beat again this year as they return all but one of their top runners from last year's squad, which placed third at the New England Championships.

Lowell, which fields one of their strongest harrier squads in recent memory, should pose more of a challenge to BC this year. They return all of their top runners, including Division II All-American Dave Cremin, who won this race last year. He will try to do this season what no other runner at Lowell has ever done, earn his fourth All-American honor in cross country.

Senior Mike Chamberas will add front-running depth to Lowell. He missed the cross country season last year with injuries but came back in the Spring to earn All-American honors in the 10,000-meters in track.

While the teams from BC and Lowell are virtually unchanged, UMass must fill the voids left by the graduation of four of their top runners from a year ago.

"There are always question marks in the first meet of the season, regardless of whether you have a veteran-laden team or not," O'Brien said. "I feel that the team is in pretty good shape and I hope to see some people step forward into the front-running spots that were vacated by graduation.

"I think that we're at the point where we can compete with these two teams. I sense the enthusiasm of the kids and I'm pleased with the work they've done over the summer to prepare for the season."

Thomas pressed on position changes

By JAMES ROWLEY
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Frustrated Democrats accused Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas Thursday of evading questions about his retreat from past positions and unreasonably refusing to say how he would approach future cases.

"That's the most inartful dodge I've ever heard," Thomas was told at one point by Sen. Joseph R. Biden, the Judiciary Committee chairman, after the nominee said he "could not sit here and decide" whether unmarried couples had a right to privacy.

Thomas eventually said sexual relations and childbearing by unmarried couples were protected by a privacy right, but not before Biden said: "It's getting more like a debate to get information."

Despite such complaints there did not appear to be a solid opposition to the nomination.

Thomas continued to turn aside questions about his views on abortion, finally telling Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., "Whether or not I have a view is irrelevant."

On the subject of changing positions, Kohl asked Thomas, "Why is it inappropriate for us to make an evaluation of your career based on all of what you have written and said?"

Republicans on the committee came to his defense, as did President Bush who said at the White House that Thomas was "doing a beautiful job up there."

Bush, asked at a news conference about the credibility of Thomas' claim not to have an opinion on the landmark 1973 court decision legalizing abortion, said simply, "That's a question for the Senate to decide."

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, complained that Thomas had been asked about abortion 70 times, compared to the 36 questions about the issue that were asked last year at David Souter's confirmation hearing. Souter was confirmed despite his refusal to answer such questions.

"I don't understand why you are being treated any differently than these other confirmable people," Hatch said.

A federal appeals judge since last year, Thomas, 43, was nominated this summer to replace resigning Justice Thurgood Marshall. Both men are Black, but Thomas has a strongly conservative record opposed to Marshall's liberalism.

Biden, D-Del., expressed exasperation at Thomas' insistence during three days of hearings that he espoused "natural law principles" only as political theory, not as political philosophy.

"That strikes me as something different than what you said" in many previous speeches, Biden told Thomas.

"I have not in any speech said we should adjudicate cases by directly appealing to natural law," Thomas told Biden.

When Republicans sought a brief recess, Biden told Thomas: "Your friends think you are getting into trouble."

"That's not fair," said Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., Thomas' prime Senate sponsor who has sat behind the nominee

Five vying for interim SAO position

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The impending appointment of an interim director for the Student Activities Office, expected today or Monday, will be a major determinant of this year's relations between the Student Government Association and the UMass administration, student leaders said yesterday.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin said there are five candidates for the position, all of whom she has interviewed. The position was vacated earlier this month when current director Irene Carew announced her intention to take an 11-month leave beginning September 15.

Among the five candidates are Director of Off-Campus Housing Joanne Levenson and Program Director Jose Tolson of SAO. Sarah Boy, special assistant to the Vice Chancellor, is also a candidate.

The two candidates sought by SGA leaders are Associate Dean of Academic Affairs Ricardo Townes and Director of Legal Services Charles DiMare.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan and Speaker of the Senate Robert Monaghan said they met with Vanin both yesterday and earlier in the week to discuss their choices for the position.

Time capsule reveals UMass campus of 1878

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

A time capsule from the class of 1878, excavated last spring, is now on display at the University Tower Library.

Last October, a wind storm damaged a white pine near the Old Chapel. Investigating the history of the tree, Archives Assistant Michael Milewski said he discovered it was actually the "Class Tree" of 1878.

Further research led to the excavation last May uncovering a time capsule. The contents are now on exhibit in the lobby of the Tower Library.

The contents of the time capsule were damaged by water and had to be placed in a deep-freeze for one month in order to "stablize" the remnants, said Milewski.

Among the articles displayed is a handwritten poem for the Class Tree, a program for the planting ceremony and an Index published in the year 1876, produced by the members of the class of 1878, then juniors. It was the eighth volume of the publication. Also on hand is the small copper box which contained the historical artifacts.

Other parts of the exhibit include a photo essay on both the excavation project and the life of the Class Tree, a follow-up on the lives of the 17 graduates, and a cross section of the tree which lived to be almost 114 years old. Arrows mark rings of the tree and note their years.

The time capsule was buried nine years before the completion of the Old Chapel, 15 years before the creation of the campus pond, and 28 years before the first women graduated from what was then called the Massachusetts Agricultural College.

A list of the members of the class of 1878 showed that all except two lived in the buildings of North College and South College. One lived on Lincoln Avenue and the other, Horace Edward Stockbridge, lived with his father, a professor.

"The most interesting event of the year to us was the tree-planting during Commencement Week, 1877," was a comment taken from the records of the class supper, about a year after the occasion.

In 1877, the college had only 11 faculty members, whose names may sound familiar to most University students: Levi Stockbridge, Henry H. Goodell, Charles A. Goessmann and M. Fayette Dickinson. Each of these later had academic buildings named for them.

The exhibit began on September 9 and will continue through December 30. It can be viewed during regular library hours.

Nymphomaniac faces trial in Florida

Plea agreement crumbles, new charges considered in case

By SANDRA WALEWSKI
Associated Press

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — A self-proclaimed nymphomaniac and her husband face trial on prostitution charges after prosecutors withdrew a plea agreement amid reports defense attorneys tried to sell a bedroom videotape of the woman.

Prosecutor Joe Lazarus accused attorney Ellis Rubin of conflict of interest and negotiating the plea agreement on behalf of Kathy and Jeffrey Willets in bad faith.

The Willetses had planned to enter guilty pleas Wednesday, but the state dropped its offer after a reporter said that defense attorneys tried to sell a secret bedroom videotape of the woman with a client.

Lazarus said it now appears the Willetses participated in crimes not included in the deal. He said making the videotape would be illegal under state law.

During a hearing Wednesday before Broward Circuit Judge John A. Frusciante, Lazarus presented defense attorneys with a new plea agreement to look over. No details were released.

The couple charged clients from $50 to $150 an hour and made as much as $25,000 over six months, investigators said. They face trial on the original charges Oct.2.

Rubin had planned to argue that Mrs. Willets, 33, suffered from nymphomania and her 41-year-old husband, a Broward County sheriff's deputy, has spells of impotence. Her husband is said to have watched and taken notes from a bedroom closet.

Television reporter Steve Wilson of "Inside Edition" said Tuesday that one of Rubin's sons, attorney Guy Rubin, offered to sell the program for $60,000 a videotape of Mrs. Willets having sex with former Fort Lauderdale Vice Mayor Doug Danziger, who was known for anti-vice campaigns.

Danziger resigned as vice mayor July 30. His lawyer, David Bogenshutz, said Wednesday he could not confirm whether his client was involved with the Willetses, but said: "He's going to hate this. He thought it was over."

Rubin has denied making any deal with the nationally syndicated tabloid television show.

"It now has been revealed that 'Inside Edition's' reporter came to my office to entrap us into some illegal or unethical act," Rubin told the judge. "They never intended to buy anything. All they wanted to do was trap us."

Av Westin, co-executive producer of "Inside Edition" said the show has broken no law or journalistic standards. "We reject any assertion that 'Inside Edition' engaged in any wrongdoing," he said.

Meanwhile, the 4th District Court of Appeals issued a temporary stay on release of a list of alleged prostitution clients. The appeals court set hearings for Friday and Monday on that list.

Alert systems maker sued

SANTA ROSA, Calif. (AP) — A provider of home emergency medical alert systems marketed to the elderly is the target of a $2 million lawsuit accusing the company of high-pressure and misleading sales tactics.

Life Emergency Response Inc., based in Chatsworth, is named in a suit filed Wednesday in Sonoma County Superior Court by district attorneys in eight counties. State Attorney General Dan Lungren joined the suit.

The suit alleges that Life Alert used a high-pressure, deceptive pitch to sell the system to the aged and disabled.

"One 80-year-old woman was subjected to a six-hour sales presentation," said Jeffrey Holtzman, a Sonoma County deputy district attorney.

The lawsuit accuses the company of misrepresentation in claiming its systems were more reliable than the public 911 systems and its staff had backgrounds in law enforcement and air traffic control.

"People are paying a lot of money for something they could get by dialing 911," said state Deputy Attorney General Laura Kaplan.

Eric Bordo, a Life Alert spokesman, said he would respond only to questions submitted in writing.

The Life Alert system is an electronic device that alerts company employees to call emergency dispatchers. It costs $1,700 to $5,000, plus maintenance charges, the lawsuit says.

Protesters blast GE

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Two protesters set up shop outside the Accounting Career Fair in the Campus Center yesterday to demonstrate against fair participant General Electric's role in the manufacture of weapons.

The protesters set up an information table outside the Campus Center Auditorium and also showed a 30-minute videotape by a group called INFACT, "an international grassroots organization of concerned people organizing effective campaigns to stop the life-threatening abuses of transnational corporations," according to campaign literature.

The videotape, "DEADLY DECEPTION: General Electric, Nuclear Weapons & Our Environment," advocates a boycott on all GE products.

Kevin Smith said he left work early from his job as support staff worker in the interlibrary loan office at UMass to protest GE's "sordid history for lack of concern for the environment, employees and general disrespect for safety regulations.

"I'm here today because GE has one point of view and [INFACT] has another," he said. "They have a death confirmed view and we have a life confirm agenda."

An employee at the GE booth, Pablo Penaloza, declined to comment on the protest.

According to literature provided by Smith, INFACT is focusing on GE because it is "the leader of the nuclear weapons industry."

One of the nation's largest corporations, GE produces a wide-range of products, including light bulbs, appliances, medical equipment and industrial products. GE also operates an on-line computer service and several other service-oriented businesses.

Fair organizers said the protesters were quiet and did not disrupt activities.

Protesters began handing out literature to those going into the accounting fair shortly after it opened at 1 p.m.

Interim pres. E.K. Fretwell talks to profs

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts can be the shining success so dearly needed by the Commonwealth in these troubled times, UMass interim President E. K. Fretwell told about 100 professors in a Faculty Senate meeting yesterday.

"Drawing on our increasingly wide knowledge and resources to help the commonwealth," he said. "In other words, rather than saying what has the Commonwealth done for us lately, we can say what have we done for it."

Fretwell cited public education for grades K-12, health and environmental safety, cities in distress and the stimulation of international trade as examples of areas in which the University can aid the state in getting back on its feet.

Fretwell went on to say that the University has the opportunity to become a "world class institution." He also said that the University was given extensive political strength with the addition of the University of Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts University campuses to the system.

The reorganization gave the University system the ability to better solicit funding from both the public and private sectors as well as to have better control over academic coordination between the five campuses to eliminate "unnecessary" duplication of curriculum, Fretwell said.

Fretwell also said the inherent strengths of the five campuses could be enhanced by sharing faculty and making it possible for students to transfer from one campus to another in order to take classes not available at the campus in which they are enrolled.

"I'm not suggesting we bring up a generation of scholar gypsies," he said. "But at least we can talk about ways and find ways for students enrolled at one campus to move to one campus and back to the original campus. All kinds of things can and will happen."

Fretwell said in order to achieve world class status he had set up five task forces, each headed by one of the chancellors with the purpose of coming up with ways for the University to achieve the status of a world class institution.

Fretwell cautioned against setting goals too high, especially given the position of the University's budget.

"As we move ahead in our goal to become a world class university, we will simultaneously restrain ourselves from trying to be all things to all people overnight," he said.

Following Fretwell was Chancellor Richard O'Brien, who explained the "year of austerity," in which the University absorbs fantastic budgetary cuts in operating costs while holding on to the elements essential to long-term success for the University.

"We will maintain these standards at the expense of the quality and comfort of our daily lives," he said.

SGA kicks off another year

Monaghan: time for infighting, factions in the past

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Nominations opened up yesterday for the Undergraduate Student Senate and Commuter Area Government. The nomination papers are due next Friday at 5 p.m. in Student Government Office on the second floor of the Student Union.

Any University of Massachusetts student may acquire nomination papers at 420 Student Union. They need 25 signatures to get nominated, according to Robert Monaghan, the speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate.

Elections will take place October 1.

Monaghan pledges that "student government will be active again," referring to the chaos and factional fighting that has reigned in student government for the past few years.

"This is an optimal time to get involved in student government," he said. "We are making great strides. We believe that with students involved, we'll have a powerful voice."

Monaghan said the primary purpose of the student government is "to make student life on campus better."

He plans to organize and mobilize the "students into a political force." At the present time, Monaghan said students do not possess a powerful, unified lobbying voice.

"We have no political influence," he said.

Other goals of the student government are to receive official recognition from the administration, regain students litigation rights for the Legal Services Office, and most importantly, he said, to spur students to vote.

Monaghan wants the student government to share a solid relationship with the administration and graduate students.

Richard O'Brien, serving as intermin chancellor for two years, has made it "an active goal of his to have a good relationship with the students," Monaghan said. "I think [O'Brien] is trying to clear up problems between the administration and the students."

It was reported yesterday that O'Brien wishes to improve the effectiveness of the SGA and refine the government's relationship to the administration.

Activists discuss struggle in the Middle East

• Say women denied freedoms

By JESSAME HANNUS
Collegian Staff

Two political activists gave a talk yesterday afternoon at the University of Massachusetts on women's struggles and national liberation in the Middle East.

Rabab Hadi, a Palestinian born in the Israeli-occupied West Bank city of Nablus, currently lives in New York. A freelance journalist and a founding member of the Union of Palestinian Women's Association, she was joined by Simona Sharoni, an Israeli feminist peace activist.

Sharoni is an active member of Women in Black, an international women's protest group working to end the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Speaking before a small audience in the Campus Center, Sharoni addressed the sexism of Israel. She pointed out that people often assume that the women of Israel are liberated because they must serve in the military.

But she said it is still "a very sexist country."

"It has been very difficult for women to have a political voice," Sharoni said.

She said if a woman tries to take a vocal stand against the Israeli occupation of the West Bank, she can expect to be verbally abused or asked if she has a "Palestinian boyfriend."

Both Sharoni and Hadi mentioned the effect the Persian Gulf War had on the political situation in Israel and the area they have occupied. Sharoni said that the Israeli government used the Gulf War to effectively silence the political activities of the left.

The war interrupted much of the activity, due to curfews and increased tension and suspicion between the Palestinian and the Israeli activists, she said.

Hadi spoke of the problems faced by the Palestinians living in the occupied areas and problems that apply specifically to women on the West Bank.

She said one of the most difficult aspects of being a woman on the West Bank is sexual abuse while in police custody.

Pregnant women are also very poorly treated in captivity, she said. One woman was forced to give birth with her hands cuffed and her legs manacled, she said.

One of the hardest things for women activists is that they must fight not only the occupation but sexism as well. When they question policies toward women, they are told, "Now is not the time." Hadi said both struggles "go hand in hand."

Hadi said the United States contributes greatly to the problems in the Middle East. She pointed out that Israel would withdraw occupation if they didn't have the money to be there.

• War brings old issues to forefront

In order for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to be resolved, observers need to see the conflict in the context of other international events and to challenge the dominant conceptions about the region, according to two Middle Eastern political activists.

Palestinian journalist Rabab Hadi and Israeli peace activist Simona Sharoni spoke before a small audience last night at Hampshire College on "Women's Struggles and National Liberation in the Middle East."

Hadi, a founding member of the Union of Palestinian Women's Association, said that the recent Persian Gulf War has brought to the surface many problems which have long existed in the Middle East.

"In reality, much didn't change between before the war and after," Hadi said. "What the conflict did was to bring to the surface issues that have always existed — perhaps more to the people of the United States than anywhere else.

"Americans became more knowledgeable about what was occurring."

Hadi noted the attention given during the war to the lack of rights for women in Saudi Arabia, and that many Westerners were shocked by the fact that Saudi women couldn't drive. Even though Saudi women were barred by law from driving since 1985, Hadi said the war only brought that to people's attention years later.

Hadi pointed to the decline of the Soviet Union as allowing the United States to exert great power in the Middle East.

"What allowed Bush to come up with his slogan of a New World Order was the absence of any deterrent to U.S. power," Hadi said. "There is one superpower in the world — the U.S.A., pursuing policies of exploitation and domination."

Sharoni, an activist in the effort to end the Israeli occupation of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, said that language was a key to fighting for change in the Middle East.

"It's important for us not to take our language from the language used by the U.S. administration," Sharoni said. "People in other countries who have been deprived of human rights buy the substitute and accept the U.S. definition of peace."

Sharoni said peace activists and academics in this country need to work to develop their own separate set of definitions regarding the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

"We need work that comes from radical circles," Sharoni said. "We are fortunate that there some alternative sources of information in this country."

"We went in to make our position clear," Monaghan said. "Ric Townes is our number one candidate."

Newnan said "the candidates we want are Ric or Chuck," but that Townes was preferable because he would hold the SAO position full-time, while DiMare would continue to hold his position as Legal Services director while directing SAO.

"Chuck Dimare wants Ric to be the director, because he knows they can work together," Monaghan said. "Ric has very good relations with students, and he's very sensitive to the Black community and to the Third World community."

Monaghan said he felt Townes would restore the advocacy role of the Office of Third World Affairs that has become "disempowered" in his words during Carew's tenure as SAO director.

Newnan, Monaghan and SGA President David Gagne said they told Vanin that DiMare and Townes were the only candidates they felt could work well with student government.

"Anyone from the Vice Chancellor's office or from within SAO is unacceptable," Newnan said. "It's not that we're labeling any of the other three candidates as unacceptable, it's where they come from."

Vanin said that while she was aware of student's concerns, she needed to balance them with the consideration of the entire Student Activities Office.

"I've heard the [SGA leadership's] concerns, and I'm balancing them with the needs for the whole program," Vanin said. "Whatever decision I make, there are some people who will be happy and some who won't.

"It's difficult to keep everyone happy when there are people with different opinions," she said.

Vanin said she is aware that the appointment will bear heavily on the relations between the administration and student government.

"It will be seen [as a test of relations] by some," Vanin said. "I have talked with each of the candidates about my sincere commitment to establishing a working relationship with students.

"We all have a shared concern [in the appointment]," Vanin said.

The Crime Prevention Unit of the University of Massachusetts Police Department warns students to take extra care in safeguarding their property when in campus athletic facilities.

Police said at the beginning of the semester lockers in these buildings are often broken into.

Police suggest not to leave items of value in the lockers and baskets provided by the University. In the past, numerous items have been taken from these lockers both locked and unlocked, police said.

In other police business:

ARRESTS:

• Robert A. Riordan Jr., 20, of Longmeadow, was arrested Wednesday in Moore Residence Hall and charged with being a minor in possession of alcohol.

• Raymond O. Clarke, 21, of Northampton, was arrested early Thursday morning near the Bluewall on an outstanding warrant.

LARCENY:

• A student reported Tuesday the theft of his wallet and contents which included numerous bank and credit cards and drivers license. Police said he left the wallet next to his bike.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Americans are being held hostage and it's time we acted

In the wake of the failed coup attempt in the Soviet Union and other recent events, people tend to forget of the other important business overseas: American hostages.

Yes, UMass students, there really are Americans held against their will in the Middle East. And you thought your situation was bad. Take a few minutes out of your important lives, and think a little about someone else today.

"What can we do," you ask. Well, you can first try to learn about the situation, and then try to put pressure on those who are terrorists. The hostage situation will not go away by itself, and the more informed we become, the more power we wield.

First lesson: We cannot afford to bargain with terrorists. The reason behind this is that if we give in once, it will send a signal to terrorists that we will always give in.

Second lesson: The terrorists, and those who advocate terrorism, kidnapping and the like are driven by their cause, even to the point of violence. Obviously, we think differently in terms of human lives than the terrorists do. Remember Beirut?

Anyone who would kill themselves in the process of destroying other human lives is crazy. There is no rationality behind it, yet the predominant feeling among these groups is that this is perfectly natural. How can you possibly sit down and talk to such people? You cannot. Saddam Hussein is a good example.

Michael Morrissey

Third lesson: Our hostages' "value" has never been lower. Even the terrorists realize that there are more pressing events than listening to some fanatics' ridiculous demands.

Americans must have confidence that the quiet diplomacy by Secretary of State James Baker and President Bush will eventually pay off. This leads us to a fourth lesson.

We must get Israel's behind over to the peace table. Israel has done absolutely nothing in the way of resembling the ally they have been in the past months, as they refuse to even talk to other nations about peace. Is it any wonder why the other countries of that region hate us?

Like a spoiled child, they keep demanding everything from everybody without yielding at all. Israel could help us release our hostages if they felt like it, yet their own agenda is too important. Only with Israel at the peace table will terrorists talk to us.

Fifth lesson: Overt military action will not work. If negotiations fail, our only alternative is to take covert military action.

As a citizen, I could think of no better option. Our fine soldiers would get hands-on experience, so to speak, and because of our determination to free our fellow citizens, we would not be denied, even by suicide missions.

The United States should waste no time in forcibly moving in and freeing our hostages, and all hostages. Every day that goes by is another day in Hell for those citizens.

Finally, never forget. Never forget these American citizens who are held against their will in unspeakable conditions. Terry Anderson, Thomas Sutherland, Joseph Cicippio, Alan Steen and Jesse Turner. Do not forget them.

As a great president once said, "One American held hostage is a whole nation held hostage."

One little girl isn't happy

The Soviet Union is pushing toward democracy, and people are happy. The Red Sox are four games back, and people are happy. Clarence Thomas is holding up against the Senate inquisition and some people are happy about that, too.

Shemika Jenkins is not happy at all, because she is dead.

Sunday, Shemika left her Uncle Warren's house in the Bronx to return home after spending a night with her cousins. Fourteen hours later, Shemika's father Darryl called on his brother for the whereabouts of his little girl.

A 4-foot-tall, 65-pound girl was found stuffed in a laundry bag and wedged in a seawall below the Triborough Bridge Tuesday afternoon. Her name was Shemika Jenkins.

Thomas A. George

While traveling from her Uncle's home to her own, which is only a floor below in the same apartment building, Shemika met her death.

The mother of a classmate of Shemika told a New York Times reporter, "This is a bad neighborhood, my daughter doesn't go down to play because the neighborhood is crack infested."

Her daughter said the children in the neighborhood "don't like to go anywhere. If they run from their mother, somebody is going to take them."

Simply put, by a little voice in the middle of the Bronx, there are people, especially children, who have become hostages in their own homes. The violence of this kind is no stranger to any Metropolitan News section of the Times, and it is not difficult to ignore.

Ask George Bush, he could tell you that all the Shemikas have not been the topic of conversation on the approach shot to the eighth green in Kennebunkport.

The lack of progress in the reversal of fortune for inner-city crime has been pushed aside by so many issues in the last three years, especially overseas. Even the talk of a renewed economy looming on the horizon has put the crack/crime wave to the back burner once again.

Consider the Staten Island Ferry terminal fire, in which the roof went ablaze because of what New York City's chief fire marshal said in the Times was most likely homeless, careless crackheads who forgot to stamp out a cigarette butt.

The upper floor of the terminal is known as the cockloft, and is a local hangout for drinking, talking and firing up a little rock candy. Dozens of crack vials were found in the cockloft by fire officials.

Many times terminal officials had tried to remove loiterers, and officials claim that they had no idea that the homeless had gained entrance to the cockloft.

If you read this in a certain way, it would almost sound like the homeless were deliberately causing problems for commuters who ride the Staten Island Ferry. This, of course, is absurd, for the issue of the homeless is everyone's problem.

What kind of bad craziness was going on when the fire was mistakenly started? Well, it was nothing as remarkable as the breakdown of the Soviet Union, not as notable as the selection of a new Supreme Court Justice, nor was it as observed as Monday Night Football.

But someone better notice, and notice quick, because like everything else, big change happens fast, and someone needs to be on top of the situation.

"Right, George?"

Thomas A. George is a Collegian staff member

This all really happened

It all really happened to me. Honest, it did.

I got electrocuted this morning. No, I wasn't blow-drying my hair while shaving my legs in the bathtub. All I wanted to do was brush my teeth. But I made the mistake of turning on the light switch and stepping on the bathroom rug. And I wasn't dripping wet or carrying a fork.

That's all I had to do to get a shock that sent me leaping off my feet, screaming into the hallway. I quickly turned, expecting to see the room engulfed in flames, but all I saw was a smoking ceiling light fixture.

My heart pounded and my body shook as I ran to the mirror, expecting to see Buckwheat or Bart Simpson. My roommates came running, and one said, "It sounded like the garbage disposal." Another asked me if I wanted to go to Health Services. Reason for care: electrocution. No, I just couldn't see it. There wasn't any smoke coming out of my ears, and my hair wasn't any curlier.

Amy Prendergast

I arrived at my 11:15 class at 11:30, Cheerio breath and all. Despite the tingling sensation in my right leg, and an occasional heart palpitation, I felt like I was going to make it. I considered saying, "Sorry I'm late, professor, but I discovered this morning that I conduct electricity," but I decided against it.

Luckily, I made it through the two-hour class with no major heart attacks or seizures. But I did discover that I read 160 pages of a book that I didn't have to. So, in other words, while my roommates watched Peg tell Al Bundy she was pregnant, I sat in my room and tortured myself with Mark Twain. O.K., so maybe it wasn't exactly torture.

So, now I'm in a bad mood and hungry, which is the worst combination - especially on a Monday. I reached into my bag for one of those firm and yellow bananas from Stop 'n' Shop. But to my surprise, it had transformed into a brownish, squishy looking thing.

So, now I'm walking around campus, starving, mad at myself for being so stupid, trying to shake the tingling sensation in my leg, carrying a squishy banana.

I decided then to go to and sit by the campus pond. As I turned my head to the left, I spotted a pile of doggie-doo covered with bees that I was lucky enough to have sat next to. I jumped up before I got stung by a killer bee and decided to go to Whitmore to pass in my Add/Drop form. But lo and behold, it was covered with banana juice. But that's O.K. because I only waited in line seven hours to get it signed.

I moved on to meet my roommate at our Greek Myth class. She greeted me with, "Amy, what's that brown stuff on your shorts?" I panicked. Oh no, horror of horrors, the doggie-doo. But no! Thank God, it was only the Diet Coke I had been drinking and managed to sit in.

But, hey, why should I care anyway? I only had light pink shorts on, had traveled all over campus and had seen about 30 people I knew, mostly male. No problem!

So I sat my dirty behind down in the fully air-conditioned comfort of Mahar. (Yeah, right.) I opened up the Collegian to find my horoscope. Taurus: an older person feels romantic about you. Great! The way my luck is running, I'll get scooped on by some guy who resembles my grandfather.

Well, anyway, to end my beautiful day I decided to visit my favorite building on campus, the Textbook Annex. I was in the mood to spend a million dollars on books that I really didn't want. On my walk home, I longed for the days of high school, where they gave you your books for free and you always got your classes.

But who's complaining?

AIDS conference locale says a lot about U.S. society

So, it seems, after months of debate, the 8th International AIDS Conference is to be held in Amsterdam next year. This is important not because of where this event will be held, but why.

Originally, the conference was to take place at Harvard University in Cambridge. However, due to technicalities stemming from a controversial policy "restricting" those who have AIDS or are infected with the HIV virus to hold the conference in Cambridge, it would be virtually useless because over two-thirds of those qualified to, or wishing to attend, would not be able to enter the United States. The Bush administration has flat out denied anyone with AIDS/HIV from coming into the United States.

Why is this? What is this supposed to achieve? It has already been scientifically proven that one cannot contract the virus through casual contact. But if one reads between the lines, what this is implying is that those with AIDS are still a threat to our people. That those who wish to immigrate or visit relatives from other countries who happen to be infected with HIV are animals whose number one intent is to make sure they expose and infect as many people as possible.

That all may sound a bit dramatic, but that is exactly what this signifies. This is also a slap on foreigners, saying that they're uncivilized and can't control themselves. Half of those wishing to attend this conference who are exposed are those in the medical field. With them they bring important discoveries, breakthroughs and information that is vital in achieving the goals of the Bush administration's $5 billion AIDS policy: to find a solution to the AIDS crisis.

To shut these people out would mean that it would be an American AIDS conference, with only the American AIDS "experts" in attendance. Not only would this defeat the purpose of such a valuable "international" conference, but if we look at all of the U.S. federally-funded AIDS trials, to say that significant progress is being made would be not only a unrealistic, but a pointblank, bald-faced lie.

Saad Hopkins

There is so much more promising data coming from countries such as France, Sweden and the Netherlands that blows away anything brewing here, and to deny one the right to this information by imposing a ban as insipid as this is nothing short of criminal.

But to hold this conference in Amsterdam may be a blessing in disguise. The social gaps between the Dutch and the Americans are huge. In the Netherlands there is free condom and clean needle distribution designed to curb the amount of HIV infections.

When this was proposed to Congress two years ago, the response was alarming. It was their view that if condoms were to be dispensed in our schools, it would promote sex. If needles were distributed, we'd be promoting HIV drug use.

Bull! First off, there isn't one kid out there of puberty age who isn't thinking about, if not already has engaged in, sexual activity. Should we provide him/her with the safe sex skills, gee, his chances of living to see college graduation might increase.

My point is, the Dutch are far ahead of us in this game. And while heterosexual exposure skyrockets in this country, in Holland it has decreased dramatically. And that's only one example of one European country.

Something needs to be done about AIDS, and it has to start at home. Globally, doctors, patients and those HIV-negative such as myself who actually give a damn are working on a way to end this plague.

If the world is shouting things we must hear, and we just stick the corks in our ears, when your mother, your brother or (God forbid) you become infected with a disease as devastating as AIDS, you'll wish we'd listened earlier. But by then it'll be too late.

Solzhenitsyn: USSR changing too fast for comment

By DAVID GRAM
Associated Press

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Alexander Solzhenitsyn, perhaps the century's leading commentator on Soviet affairs, is holding his fire for now, for fear his comments "will be outdated in less than a week."

The comment came in a letter responding to a request for an interview from The Associated Press.

Solzhenitsyn said he does "not consider it possible to appear as a commentator on events for which I myself persistently appealed, and which I predicted as far back as the late '60s. . ."

He added, "Moreover, they will be dynamic in detail for a long time yet, and any commentaries will be outdated in less than a week."

For answers to questions put to him in writing, the reclusive writer, who lives in the southern Vermont town of Cavendish, referred to an article he had published in two Soviet periodicals last September.

"In that article you may see presented a series of question which are topical for the USSR even today," he said in his letter.

The article, "Rebuilding Russia," urged a populist revival of democracy and spirituality in Russia, without Western cultural "garbage" or capitalist exploitation.

Publication of the piece came 11 months before just such a populist revival of democracy led by Boris Yeltsin toppled a coup by conservative hardliners.

When "Rebuilding Russia" appeared last year in the reformist newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda and the weekly literary journal Literaturnaya Gazeta, members of the Supreme Soviet were seen reading the articles in their seats.

The following is the text of a letter from the exiled Russian writer Alexander Solzhenitsyn, written in response to a request for an interview by The Associated Press:

Thank you for your kind proposal. At the present time, however, I do not consider it possible to appear as a commentator on the events for which I myself persistently appealed, and which I predicted as far back as the late '60s, already a quarter century ago. Moreover, they will be dynamic in detail for a long time yet, and any commentaries will be outdated in less than a week.

This autumn there will finally appear in the United States the English translation of my article, "Rebuilding Russia," which was printed a year ago in September in the USSR, with a circulation of 27 million copies. If you consider it necessary to comment on it, there is nothing to prevent you from doing so now. In that article, you may see presented a series of questions which are topical for the USSR even today.

Solzhenitsyn, now 72, was expelled from his homeland in 1974, a year after his "Letter to the Leaders" called for many of the reforms that recently have come to pass. Those included free functioning for the Russian Orthodox church, an end to the Communist Party's monopoly on power and independence for several of the Soviet republics.

The twin themes of calling for an end to Communist tyranny and warning against an infusion of Western culture have been features of Solzhenitsyn's work for most of the last 25 years.

In his famous Harvard commencement address in 1978, Solzhenitsyn said too much comfort had been bad for the West's spirit, that the society had become too legalistic and materialistic at the expense of higher values, and that it had lost its courage.

In the era of glasnost ushered in by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, Solzshenitsyn's longer works have been published both in book and in serial form in the Soviet Union.

The writer is most noted for works such as The Gulag Archipelago and One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, which contained devastating descriptions of life in Soviet prison camps and broad indictments on communism's legacy.

In his article "Rebuilding Russia," Solzhenitsyn again, as he has often in the past, intimated that much more was lost than gained in the Revolution of 1917.

We have to admit that the whole 20th century has been cruelly lost by our country," he wrote. "The achievements that we were shouting about are all imaginary. From a flourishing state, we have been thrown back to a half-savage state. We are bankrupt."

Still unresolved is whether and when Solzenitsyn and his wife Natalia will return to their homeland. To an offer of restored citizenship issued last year, Solzhenitsyn responded through his wife that he would not return until a charge of high treason issued against him in 1974 is revoked.

Weld names receiver for city of Chelsea

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William Weld yesterday selected former state Transportation Secretary James Carlin to be the receiver who will preside over the financially busted city of Chelsea.

Weld named Carlin later in the day, after he signed the bill placing Chelsea in receivership.

Carlin agreed to do the job for $1 a year and was scheduled to spend the day meeting with administration officials about the bill and its goals, said a source who spoke on the conditior. of anonymity.

"Jim Carlin is a tough, hard-charging administrator and that's precisely what the governor believes the governor needs right now," the administration source said.

Carlin took over the state Executive Office of Transportation and Construction under the administration of then Gov. Edward King after the previous secretary went to jail.

"We are satisfied with the final version of the bill," said Weld's legal counsel, Robert Cordy. "The language is virtually word-for-word, as we see it, with the bill we filed, so to that extent we think the receiver's going to have all the powers necessary to deal with the problems, some expected and some unexpected, in the receivership."

Chelsea Mayor John J. Brennan was not available for comment this morning. His chief nemesis, Alderman James Mitchell, blasted the Legislature's vote and said the aldermen were filing suit against the state in Superior Court.

This isn't fiscal receivership, it's political receivership," said Mitchell, "What are they covering up in this town?"

The Senate, after staving off an amendment that would have given the city government power to raise property taxes, sent the bill to the House on a voice vote.

Final approval came after a small controversy over an amendment submitted by Sen. Paul White, D-Boston, that would have weakened the receiver's powers in dealing with the city employees' unions.

House Minority Leader Peter Forman, R-Plymouth, said the House action restored the legislation to its original wording. Forman said the receiver could "break union contracts" under the restored language.

Rep. Thomas Finneran, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said legislators and lawyers disagreed on whether a state-appointed receiver could break city contracts with unions.

Most lawmakers, even though they voted for the bill, warned that it wouldn't solve all Chelsea's financial problems. Cordy said the administration had no immediate plans for a cash infusion to Chelsea, but lawmakers say that will be inevitable.

"We've given the receiver a lot of authority, but we haven't given him a magic wand," said Sen. Thomas Birmingham, D-Chelsea, who "grudgingly supported" the bill.

The receiver would have the authority to change zoning regulations, reopen union negotiations and impose or raise fees. But as proposed, the receiver could not raise taxes over the limit set by Propositon 2 1/2 unless the city's voters approve.

The office of mayor would be eliminated as long as the receiver, who would be appointed by the governor, held power. Most other elected city officials would be shunted to advisory roles.

With only 1.9 square miles, Chelsea's lack of developable land has made it virtually impossible for city leaders to increase the tax base.

The Senate rejected an amendment that would have given the mayor authority to raise property taxes by 20 percent, or $3 million. If that step hadn't been taken within 30 days, no receiver would have been appointed.

"A receiver will need more money. . .to keep the city afloat," said the amendment's sponsor, Sen. Edward Burke, D-Framingham. Burke's amendment was defeated 26-11 with the Senate President William M. Bulger, D-Boston, voting in favor.

Senate Minority Leader David Locke said the amendment would have been "the dismantling of Proposition 2 1/2," which caps property taxes unless voters choose to raise them through a referendum.

Jazz-rock fusion guitar master Coryell at Horse

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

Larry Coryell is one of the acknowledged pioneers of the "jazz-rock" fusion scene of the 1970s. His early work helped to set the stage for a flood of guitarists who gained a lot of commercial success in the 70s and 80s. Players such as Al Dimeola, John Scofield, Joe Beck, Philip Catherine and Steve Kahn all owe debts to Coryell.

Recently, however, Coryell has shifted drastically from his style of the seventies, to play in a more acoustic "straight ahead" style. He has been playing guitar since his teen-age years, piano since age four. He notes Wes Montgomery and Barney Kessel as his initial influences, and he has seen stints with such musical luminaries as Charles Mingus, Billy Cobham, Chick Corea, John McLaughlin and Mitch Mitchell (of the Jimi Hendrix Experience).

Coryell's recent trend towards acoustic play began when he played on Ricky Ford's "Future's Gold" album for Muse records in 1983. It was the first time he had done anything "straight ahead" since he had played with Elvin Jones and Jimmy Garrison some 15 years earlier (on Lady Coryell

Metallica matures, but still rocks with intensity

By LARRY LOCKWOOD
Collegian Correspondent

Metallica's new album took almost a year to finish again and many people were looking forward to its release. Their self-titled album took many fans by surprise.

More than once I've heard the cry: "What are they thinking?"

Metallica does not sound like the Metallica I was expecting, but it still is Metallica.

As I listened to the first song, "Enter Sandman," I noticed a major change. They didn't switch tempo 12 times and singer James Hetfield was actually singing. (He has reportedly taken voice lessons).

They are also slowing down, showing a deeper grind reminiscent of Soundgarden and Danzig. It may be that they're getting old or it could be their new producer Bob Rock (Motley Crue and The Cult). Rock gets Jason Newstead's bass to sound better than on the last album.

They do sound like they're holding back, though. Hetfield's voice, Lars Ulrich's drums and Kirk Hammett's solos all seem ready to break loose at any time. If this wasn't Metallica, I wouldn't have been so willing to listen again and again.

Metallica does grow on you. Hetfield doesn't bark, but he can still growl. "Through the Never" is what Metallica was. They prove they can still cook on "Struggle Within," but also can be very soulful on "The Unforgiven." It starts with a Mexican/Spanish feel and never really loses it.

On "Holier Than Thou," they've got speed, crunch and the harmony of Newstead on backup vocals. This is where I realized that lead guitarist Kirk Hammett doesn't simply attack on his solos, he flows with the music more.

Then there is the beautiful(?) ballad that sounds like a Moody Blues or ELP tune. Surprising? Yes, because it's great and it's coming from Metallica.

Yes, they are back. And though it may not be what you wanted to hear, listen to it. Once you do, you'll realize that they're still great. . . different, but great.

Professors Chesnut and May to play at Holyoke

A program of music for trumpet and organ will be presented by University of Massachusetts professors Walter Chesnut and Ernest May on Sunday, September 15 at 4 p.m. in Abbey Memorial Chapel at Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley.

The concert, to include works from the Baroque, Romantic and Contemporary periods, will feature trumpet voluntaries by Purcell, Clark and Johnson. Chesnut and May perform a similar program annually on the noon-time recital series at Columbia University's St. Paul's Chapel in New York City. This year's New York date is September 19.

The first half of the concert will feature a marvelous and unique organ by renowned builder Charles Brenton Fisk, Opus 84.

"The Mount Holyoke organ represents the culmination of my experience in building organs," said Fiske in 1983.

He was influenced by the study of antique instruments in Europe and by important early American organs. Although the Fisk organ in Abbey Chapel conforms to historical methods of building and design, its purpose is not to recreate the past but to provide an instrument for present tastes and use. It is a splendid complement to the trumpet and other instruments.

May will use the E.M. Skinner organ in the second half of the concert. In 1921 the Skinner Organ company enlarged upon the original electro-pneumatic organ in the Chapel since 1898. When the chapel was rebuilt in 1938, Ernest M. Skinner and Son upgraded the instrument. The Skinner organ that is currently in Abbey Chapel is a representative of English and American organ building.

Walter Chesnut is the recipient of the Chancellor's Medal (University of Massachusetts), Lowell Mason Award (Massachusetts Music Educators Association) and numerous other honors. He has extensive experience as a soloist throughout the United States (including the Boston Pops Orchestra) and Europe, and is a frequent conductor, clinician and adjudicator in the midwest and east.

Ernest May, chairman of the Department of Music and Dance at the University, is professor of musicology and organ and director of music for the South Congregational Church in Springfield (MA.). May is an editor of the New Bach Edition, author of articles on Bach's organ music and a contributor to the New Harvard Dictionary of Music. A recipient of numerous grants, May studied in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Andre Marchal.

Tickets to the concert are $5; $2.50 for students/seniors/ children, and are available at the door on the afternoon of the concert.

for Vanguard Records).

Coryell is currently spread over several musical endeavors, with two albums already released this year. Coryell is currently on a duet tour with guitarist Vic Juris. He has a newly formed quartet with emphasis on the electric guitar (an album is currently available on the Muse label) as well as a pseudo-reincarnation of his 1970s jazz-rock group entitled the New Eleventh House, co-led with Alphone Mouzon.

His upcoming gig at the Iron Horse looks to be a flamboyant mix of his various playing styles including jazz, rock, flamenco, classical and more, with an emphasis on the acoustic.

Larry Coryell will be in concert at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Saturday, September 14. The show starts at 7 p.m. and tickets are $10 in advance, $11.50 at the door.

Field hockey hosts Temple at Totman

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Welcome to the big time!

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team has two tough games this weekend that should determine where they stand nationally when the NCAA field hockey poll comes out.

They open their Atlantic-10 schedule today (3:30 p.m., Totman Field) against Temple University. Sunday they travel to the University of New Hampshire to take on the Wildcats.

Both games should be tough for the Minutewomen, but Coach Pam Hixon said she vows to take them "one game at a time."

Traditionally, Temple is a very strong team and this year should be no different. Their record is 2-0-1, with their wins coming against Syracuse University, 1-0, and the University of North Carolina, 3-1.

Temple is sure to be quite a challenge, as they eliminated UMass in the A-10 tournament last year, as well as beating them in the regular season.

"There's some pretty intense competition between the two teams," Hixon said. "I think that they are really strong and really fast. I think the grass [field] will be a little bit of an equalizer."

Temple forward Jane Catanzaro, the team's leading goal scorer from a year ago has graduated. The UMass team will breathe a sigh of relief about that.

Kathleen Tierney and Lori Warneka are back for the Owls. Tierney, a junior, netted two goals against North Carolina and Warneka, a senior, has a goal and two assists this year.

After UMass plays Temple, they travel to Durham, NH to square off against UNH. New Hampshire is 1-0-1, they defeated the University of Michigan, 6-1, and tied the University of Virginia 2-2.

Forward Rebecca Provost netted three goals against Michigan. She spearheads the Wildcat offense. Goaltender Gina Gioffre has made 33 saves and has a 1.30 goals against average.

If UMass has any aspirations of a national championship, they must maintain their undefeated record through the weekend. The team has had many bright spots this year, as some of the young players are coming on strong.

Tracy Barclay and Holly Hockenbrock are two players who have played solid field hockey.

Goalie Philippa Scott has done all that could be expected as she has two shutouts this year.

Most likely, if the Minutewomen can control the tempo of these two games, they will walk away with a couple of wins.

"We have to fight from start to finish, Hixon said. "We're not trying to look ahead, and we're not trying to look behind."

Women harriers open versus BC and Lowell

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Correspondent

Looking to improve on last year's 6-2 record and third place Atlantic 10 finish, the UMass women's cross country team travels to Franklin Park today to take on Boston College and UMass-Lowell in what promises to be a battle between four of the top long distance runners in New England.

Picked as the preseason favorite to win the Atlantic 10 Conference by a national magazine, the Minutewomen could be, according to head coach Julie LaFreniere, "Our best team since 1979."

The team returns five letter winners from last year's squad, including captain Michelle St. Laurent, and top runners Becky Johnson, Kelly Liljeblad, and Maureen Meldrim, as well as seniors Cate Dean and Lee Ann Ambrose.

Also adding to the Minutewomen's strength are transfers Kim Liljeblad and Tricia Mathiesen and freshmen Tracy Delutis, Cheryl Lyons, and Julie Moreau.

"The freshmen have been very impressive in practice and will contribute," LaFreniere said. "As far as Kim and Tricia are concerned, both were top runners last year at Coastal Carolina and Moorpark Community Colleges and it will be interesting to see them in action for the first time."

The Minutewomen will be without Kelly Liljeblad, last year's MVP, because of fallen arches and thus will have to head to Franklin Park minus one of their top runners.

"If we had Kelly healthy, B.C. would be hard pressed to beat us, however, without her I still think we can run a very tight race." Lafreniere said. "It's going to be BC's two top runners, (Diane Connolly and Heather Grimshaw) against Becky and Mo, but after that it's anybody's race."

The Lady Eagles are ranked 20th in Division I and are "very strong, with good depth, but not unbeatable," said LaFreniere.

UMass' other opponent, UMass-Lowell, apparently poses no real threat to either team, but according to LaFreniere, "They are building a program that a few years ago was virtually non-existant, but has come a long way in the past couple of years."

the Owls' lone goal in their 2-1 A-10 tourney loss to Penn State last year.

As for the Temple defense, the Owls have big holes to fill losing backs Tom Wall, Brett Perkins and Dave Jones to graduation. Junior Jeff Molishus will be looked upon to carry the defense this season. He was one of five players to start all 19 games last year and was chosen for the Philadelphia Soccer Seven All-Star team.

In goal for the Owls will be either Pat Kivlin or Carlos dos Santos. Kivlin saw most of the action last season, accumulating a 12-6 record in 1,613 minutes playing time. His goals against average was an impressive 1.22.

Santos only played in four games, coming out with a 1-0 record and a 0.50 GAA.

a team as anyone in the country, they can play 18 different kids and not lose anything on the field."

Ryan said, "We have a very balanced attack, there are just no holes out on the field for us, we are simply strong all around. We are a lot like UMass, we aren't a team of stars but everyone can do the job out on the playing field."

Strong would be a good way to describe the Badger defense, which includes Michelle Coole, Susie Holt and Melissa Stoberman, who are all 5-foot-10 inches tall.

"Their defense is huge and surprisingly pretty mobile," Rudy said. "They are tough to beat."

Ryan will have All-American goalie Heather Taggart in net.

"Taggart is a key to our team," Ryan said. "When things break down she comes up with the big save, and this year she has been as good as ever."

"She is fantastic, an All-American, there is not much I can say except we will have to find a way to beat her," Rudy said.

On offense Ryan looks for an all-around attack which is led by Kerri Maijala and Erica Handelman.

"Kerri is the catalyst for our team, she is a complete and very dangerous player," Ryan said.

Rudy said, "Maijala is the skill player on their team, but the rest of the forwards are also very good."

"This is going to be a great game, between two great teams," Ryan said. "UMass is an excellent team with a lot of balance. Helmuth and Scurry are just dynamite and their forwards work well together. Massachusetts is as tough as nails."

UMass' Paula Wilkens is questionable this weekend due to an ankle injury she suffered against Vermont. Wisconsin is healthy.

"Wilkens is a tough girl and a good player," Ryan said. "If there is any way that she can play I know she'll get in there."

Rudy said, "We are going to find out who we are this weekend. It will be very competitive but we can play with anyone in the country. No one is going to beat us without a battle."

utemen prefer to run rather than pass. Tornatore is the least mobile of the four, he is strictly a drop back passer, not an option QB.

The most athletic player on the team is Williams, but after listening to Reid speak at a luncheon Wednesday afternoon, don't expect him to start. Reid is worried about bringing Williams along too quickly. He feels that a bad outing may set him back rather than advance his progress.

Fasano rushed for 41 yards and threw for 77 against Delaware. He completed seven of 15 passes and threw two interceptions. When he was in the game, UMass gained 166 of its 352 total yards.

As for McGovern, his brother Bill, a former UMass coach is now coaching at Holy Cross. If he starts, it could be too much of an advantage for the Crusaders. However, Reid has not ruled out the possibility of him starting.

Going into the season, the quarterback position was the team's biggest concern. A void was created when Gary Wilkos broke a vertebra in his neck last season in the sixth game of the season against Delaware.

The season is almost two weeks old and the Minutemen are almost exactly where they were after Wilkos got injured. . .without a starting quarterback.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21 - April 19): Friends play a bigger part in your affairs now. Recognize that this could make certain relatives feel jealous. A new diet or lifestyle will change your self-image for the better. Have fun!

TAURUS(April 20 - May 20): Put your best foot forward. You receive a wonderful bonus or promotion for a job well-done. Traveling to Europe for business or pleasure is both exciting and profitable.

GEMINI(May 20 - June 20): Turn a hobby into a paying proposition. Your personal relationships demand greater care. Curb a tendency to act on impulse or be indiscreet. Mate is more conventional than you think.

CANCER(June 21 - July 22): Be flexible. Some readjustments are necessary when a spouse rejoins the work force. An inheritance will help you send a teenager to college. Your popularity soars to new heights.

LEO(July 23 - Aug. 22): Your partner's success could bring about a change of lifestyle that conflicts with your beliefs. A compromise may be necessary. A second honeymoon will help cement marital ties. Let mate set the pace.

VIRGO(Aug. 23 - Sept. 22): Trust your intuition in business; the experts are not always right. Challenge yourself instead of being so competitive with other people. Team efforts are favored.

LIBRA(Sept. 23 - Oct. 22): If you are down in the dumps, treat yourself! Plan an exciting weekend with people who share your interests. A platonic relationship is gradually changing. Be on the lookout for new job opportunities.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23 - Nov. 21): Refuse to be distracted from pursuing your cherished goals. Get right to the point in an argument. Having a heart-to-heart talk with a teenager could turn things around. Do more listening.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22 - Dec. 21): Start looking to your defenses, especially if you have been riding someone too hard. Translate an idealistic plan into reality. Hard work will accomplish miracles!

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22 - Jan. 19): Meddling in someone's affairs could bring you a sharp rebuff. Keep any radical notions under your hat. Entertaining at home helps you stretch your dollars. Keep the guest list short and select.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20 - Feb. 18): It will take great patience and ingenuity to cope with a key associate's dark mood or troubles. Keep your temper in check. You can do it if you really try!

PISCES(Feb. 19 - March 20): Go straight to the source. Make your wishes known to those who can give you what you want. Teasing around the bush only causes delays. Lay your cards on the table.

UMass hopes to rebound against HC

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The Patriot League Champs battle the Yankee Conference Champs Saturday (1:30 p.m., McGuirk Alumni Stadium) when Holy Cross comes to Amherst for a bout with the University of Massachusetts.

The Minutemen enter the contest 0-1 after last week's dismal performance at home against Delaware, a game which they lost 24-7. Holy Cross has yet to play a game this season.

Worse than their record and last week's performance is the fact that UMass is undecided as to who the starting quarterback will be.

"The competition among the quarterbacks has just begun," said UMass Coach Jim Reid. "I can tell you it will either be [Paul] Tornatore, [Tom] Fasano, [Tony] Williams or [Dave] McGovern."

Holy Cross has won nine straight games dating back to last season, the fourth-longest winning streak in the nation. Coach Mark Duffner is 49-5-1 in his five years as head coach at Holy Cross.

In Duffner's five seasons, the team has never lost an opening game. In fact, they haven't been beaten on opening day since 1979 and in addition they are 8-1-3 against UMass in season openers.

Last season, the Minutemen and Crusaders opened the season at Fitton Field in Worcester and tied 10-10. In that game, Jerome Bledsoe broke his ankle and Marco Gabrielli kicked a 47-yard field goal. . .

Last year's game was dominated by the defenses. But with UMass linebacker Mario Perry out indefinitely with either an ankle sprain or a slight fracture, safety Matt Rajotte out for the season with a back injury and Holy Cross' All-American candidate, quarterback Tom Ciaccio back, this could prove to be a one-sided offensive showcase on Holy Cross' part.

"They are so talented and they have great skill," Reid said.

Ciaccio threw for 2,611 yards and 24 touchdowns last season. He was The Sporting News' preseason Division 1-AA Offensive Player of the Year.

Fullback Jerome Fuller who rushed for 5.1 yards per carry and 450 yards is the main rushing threat of a pass oriented offense.

Last season, UMass had an assistant coach named Bill McGovern working against Holy Cross as the season opened. This year, McGovern is on the Crusader sideline to start the year.

"One of the things I'm scared about is Bill McGovern," Reid said. "He knows everything about us, he knows how to defend us and he knows what we're gonna run at them."

The Crusaders coaching staff was in attendance last week, scouting UMass.

"They were all here, talking into tape recorders, taking notes," Reid said. "That's a big advantage for them."

Who said short people have no reason to live?: UMass' 5-foot-5 (questionable) kick returner, Eric Thimas, averaged 21.5 yards in 4 returns Saturday, breaking a 27-yarder...I thought he played in the backfield: Starting fullback Mike George blasted his second collegiate punt Saturday for 42 yards, his first was a 23-yarder in the third quarter...(CHA-cho): Holy Cross' quarterback Tom Ciaccio is the Patriot League's pre-season choice for Player-of-the-Year. . .

Praise the Lord: After watching tailback John Johnson, a born-again Christian, improve his running this week in practice, Reid described him as a "born again football player". . .Take on a few defensive linemen and call me next game: Offensive guard Kai Dietiker, who played last week with pneumonia, should be almost 100 percent this week, according to Reid. . . Praise the Lord 2: The Priest on the UMass sidelines is Gary Wilkos' uncle, Father Phil Francesca. . .My favorite quarterback of the four potential starters is converted defensive back Tony Williams. . The Garden State connection: UMass' top four quarterbacks are from New Jersey. . .Holy Cross was ranked 13th in the nation in the NCAA I-AA preseason polls. . .

That's Bush League!: Reid wasn't pleased when he saw Holy Cross scouts with tape recorders in the UMass press box last Saturday. . .Yes, that's him: UMass linebacker Mario Perry has been seen around campus with a cast and crutches this week after sprraining his ankle against Delaware. Reid said the cast should have come off yesterday and he should be ready for next week's Maine contest. . .No, he didn't lose it: Kicker/punter Jim Maguire purposely kicks bare-footed. . .Impressive!: Holy Cross' head coach Mark Duffner is 49-5-1 in six years in Worcester. . .

Who is the quarterback?

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

If Coach Jim Reid knows who's starting at quarterback for the Minutemen (0-1) in tomorrow's game against Holy Cross, he's doing a good job covering it up because he's not telling a soul.

When the University of Massachusetts football team opened the season last weekend against Delaware with Tom Fasano at the helm, Reid thought he had solved the quarterback controversy, which was and still is shadowing his team.

But, Fasano was unable to march the team into the end zone and was subsequently replaced by Paul Tornatore at the start of the fourth quarter.

Tornatore completed 9-14 passes for 170 yards and one touchdown. He came within one Warren McIntire 64-yard interception and one Lamar Newsome fumble from leading the team to an improbable 17-0 come-from-behind victory in the fourth quarter.

After the game, when Reid was asked who his starting QB for the Holy Cross game would be, he answered, "I don't know." And the same answer was given yesterday.

"We haven't decided yet," he said. "We have an idea, but we may not make the decision until Friday "When you score only seven points. . . you have to take a look at who's doing what," Reid said.

Tornatore would seem to be the most likely choice because of his performance last week. But, the Min-

Soccer teams face tough weekend tests on the road

• Women at Wisconsin Invitational

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team faces a big test this weekend as they travel to Madison, Wisconsin for the Wisconsin Invitational, as one of four nationally ranked teams.

The Minutewomen (1-0) are ranked No. 13 in the nation and will face No. 20 California (0-1) on Saturday and then No. 7 Wisconsin (1-0) on Sunday. Southern Methodist (1-1) ranked No. 14, is also in the field.

"This is a very big weekend for us to find out how good we are," said Massachusetts Coach Jim Rudy. "We have to play two excellent teams and we have to play well to win."

"This is going to be a great weekend for women's soccer," said Wisconsin coach Greg Ryan. "This is, by far, the best tournament we have ever hosted. You can't ask for much more than four ranked teams."

For Massachusetts, the great soccer begins with the Golden Bears. California will be led by junior midfielder Devon Fitzpatrick, who led the team in scoring last season with eight goals, and sophomore forward Erika Hinton.

"Devon is a key player but we have a balanced scoring attack, we don't rely on one performer," California coach Andy Bonchonsky said. "Our team has a lot of depth and a lot of talent but we are young and we make mistakes and that cost us against Colorado College [a 1-0 season opener loss]."

UMass defeated California 3-0 last season.

"[UMass] simply dominated us in that game, they deserved to win by three," Bonchonsky said. "This year I expect them to be just as strong, they may have lost [April] Kater but they still have tons of talent. Holly Helmuth may be the best defenseman in the country this year."

"California is a very dangerous team, they have so much depth that you can't wear them out," Rudy said. "Last year we capitalized on a few of their mistakes but the game was tight. We will have to play the same opportunistic way to win again."

Massachusetts will start Briana Scurry, fresh off her shutout against Vermont, in net this weekend. Bonchonsky has yet to decide between junior Jen Netherwood or freshman Kyla Schmedding. Netherwood played against Colorado College.

One California player that won't play is mid-fielder Tiffani Hobbs. Hobbs blew out her knee in the season opener and is out for the year.

"Tiffani is a key player, she has the best shot on our team with either leg and she has the best vision," Bonchonsky said. "It is tough to adjust to losing such a big player this early but we are deep so we'll manage.

"Massachusetts is just so tough, we can't make any mistakes or it will be over, and quickly," she said.

It doesn't get any easier for the Minutewomen on Sunday as they face the host Wisconsin Badgers. Wisconsin defeated Creighton 3-0 in their season opener and may be the class of a very classy field this weekend.

"The Wisconsin team is just loaded with great players," Rudy said. "They are as deep

• Men try to make it 4 in a row at UNH

By CHRIS MIRACLE
Collegian Staff

Elmer Fudd has not had as much luck catching that wascally wabbit as the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team has had with their opposition.

Building up a road warrior type reputation, the Minutemen have had their gunsights on target as they rifled down their latest challenger, beating the University of New Hampshire 2-1 on Wednesday in New Hampshire.

The Minutemen have already equalled their total number of victories last year and have a 3-0 record (1-0 in the A-10).

Wasting little time, fullback Todd Kylish put the Minutemen on the board first at 1:28, scoring on a penalty kick.

The Minutemen were one man short when the goal was scored. Captain, fullback Dan Lawrence suffered a broken nose in the first minute of play and it was not known until after the goal was scored if he would return. Freshman midfielder Steve Scott came in to substitute for the remainder of the game.

In the second half, Kylish came through again, netting the Minutemen's second goal from the back post. Midfielder Brett Anthony had the assist, setting the play up with a cornerkick.

Freshman Jeff McHale scored the Wildcats lone goal, knocking the ball in at 75:24 on a deflection off a UMass defender.

The UMass defense held the Wildcats top scorer, Ryan Leib scoreless. "We stuck with the zone until we went up 2-0," UMass Coach Sam Koch said. "After that we marked Leib for the rest of the game."

As for the offense, Koch said there are a few more things to iron out in practice. "UNH played a more direct, up-and-back style offense where we tried to build it up at midfield," he said.

"The offense didn't play as well as it did against Siena. UNH played a high-pressured defense, the best team we've played so far in that aspect," Koch said.

The Minutemen, successful in the Wildcat hunt, now needs some more high-pressured play as they trek to Philadelphia tomorrow to try and outsmart those wascally Owls from Temple Univeristy.

With the loss of six starters to graduation, the Owls still return this season with a lot of talent and experience. Led by Coach John Boles in his 18th season, Temple is coming off a 13-6 campaign last year, earning them a bid to the A-10 tourney for the fourth consecutive year. The Owls are currently 2-0.

The offense is led by forwards Itzhak Assor and Chris Cotton both of whom accounted for 40 percent of the Owls scoring.

Assor led the Owls last season in points with 22 goals, four assists. Two of his goals were game-winners, one against LaSalle University and the other against Philadelphia Textile. Cotton, tying for second in team scoring (seven goals, four assists), earned himself Rookie of the Year honors in the A-10. He was also an honorable mention in the A-10.

Sophomores Andrew Craig, Jason Hunter and Getulo Tomala make up the midfield for the Owls. Craig finished fourth in team scoring with 11 points despite missing six games with a torn ligament in his knee. He received Rookie of the Week honors, scoring

Townes yet to reply to SAO directors job

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The contentious position of interim director of the Student Activities Office was offered Friday to one of the five candidates for the position, although an official decision has yet to be announced.

Associate Dean of Academic Affairs Ricardo Townes, the top choice of the Student Government Association leadership, was offered the position on Friday, according to sources involved in the hiring process.

The position of SAO director opened late last month when it was announced that current director Irene Carew would be taking an 11-month professional improvement leave effective Sept. 15.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin said she had hoped to be able to make an official announcement on Friday, but that the announcement would have to wait until the beginning of this week. Vanin said she hoped to have the position filled as soon as possible.

Among the other four candidates are Program Coordinator Jose Tolson of SAO and Director of Off-Campus Housing Joanne Levenson. Sarah Boy, special assistant to the vice chancellor of student affairs and Charles Dimare, director of the Legal Services Office, are also candidates.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said he told Vanin last week that while "the candidates we want are Ric or Chuck," Townes was preferable because he would serve full-time as SAO head. Dimare would continue his position as Legal Services Director while serving as part-time SAO director.

Members of the SGA leadership have made it clear that the directorship of SAO would be the major determinant of relations between the administration and student government.

The administration reluctantly recognized the election of Newnan and SGA President David Gagne early last May when it realized Massachusetts state law mandates the election of the Student Trustee be held by April 15.

Last week, Chancellor Richard O'Brien issued a letter to Gagne attempting to clarify student government's relationship to the administration through the drafting of a "Relationship Statement" to be submitted to the Chancellor's Office by March 1, 1992 and requesting the SGA to draft a constitution by the end of the academic year.

The letter also asked the SGA to "hold appropriate confirmation proceedings for President, Treasurer and Speaker of the Senate," in what was widely seen as an effort to improve relations between the administration and the SGA.

Newnan said the appointment of an SAO director who can work with student government will be a test of the administration's expressed desire to fostering better relations with the SGA.

"[The appointment] is what will make or break us," Newnan said. "It will show whether the administration is sincere in its desire to work with us."

Newnan said he has made it clear to Vanin that anyone from within SAO or the Vice Chancellor's office is "unacceptable." Newnan added that none of the individual candidates were being "labeled as unacceptable," but that the SGA leadership wouldn't be able to work with anyone from SAO or the Vice Chancellor's office.

Accident victim improving

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The condition of a 19-year-old University of Massachusetts student involved in an accident with a car last week has improved, a hospital official said.

Michael Hearn, of Falmouth, who suffered severe head injuries when his head splintered the windshield of a car driven by Ernesto Maysonet, 19, has improved from critical condition in the intensive care unit to fair condition at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield.

Police believe Hearn, a freshman environmental science major, wandered into the path of Maysonet's car on North Pleasant St. where he was struck at about 11 p.m.

Hearn was struck by the left side of the car, splintering the windshield, police said. The impact threw Hearn into the other North Pleasant St. lane where he was almost struck by another car.

The accident is still under investigation, police said.

Efforts to increase state spending could fail

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The Legislature's top Democratic budget writers say social activists' efforts to increase state spending will fail, even though tax collections are a bit better than expected.

"The example I'd use for (fiscal year 1992) is we didn't fall over the edge of the cliff, but we're on the edge of the cliff. We are balanced, but it is a very tentative balance," House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, said in an interview.

His Senate counterpart, Democrat Patricia McGovern of Lawrence, also said that the economy and the state's revenue picture aren't good enough to allow higher spending.

The $13 billion budget for fiscal 1992, which began last July 1, trimmed spending more than $600 million below the previous year. It also included significant cuts in many social service programs, as well as in aid to cities and towns.

"It's hard to hold the line. There are so many people in need, so many cities and towns in need," McGovern said. " On the other hand, if you don't hold the line, you cause those people more pain in the future.

"You take the medicine, you cure the patient. If you don't take the medicine, you feel better at the time, but then you get sicker," she said.

Finneran said higher taxes still are not an option for the Legislature, and not just because of Republican Gov. William F. Weld's opposition to them.

"It's something that most economists would agree. You don't enact significant taxes in the midst of a recession, particularly when there is no horizon on the recession," Finneran said in an interview.

McGovern also agreed the votes just aren't there in the Legislature for a tax increase.

Finneran raised the warnings last week during debate on overriding some of Weld's vetoes in the 1992 fiscal year budget passed June 30.

While supporting the veto overrides, Finneran warned spending advocates that the veto votes weren't a signal the Legislature would return to the tax-and-spend practices of the past.

Finneran said the 1992 budget was balanced in part with one-time revenues, such as the sale of state assets worth $230 million.

Even if that money comes in, and some of it is questionable, it won't be available for next year's budget.

Finneran said he anticipates that tax collections in the bookkeeping year that starts July 1, 1992, will be at essentially the same level as this year.

Weld and Democratic legislative leaders estimated that this year's tax collections would total $8.3 billion.

But collections for July and August, the first two months of the current fiscal year, have come in higher than the Weld administration's most optimistic estimate.

This has prompted advocates such as the Tax Equity Alliance of Massachusetts and the Human Services Coalition to propose restoration of some of the cuts in welfare programs the Legislature made to balance the budget.

But Finneran said that would be a serious budgetary mistake. "Any revenue growth we do have will be sorely needed to fill the holes when those non-recurring items non-recur," he said.

"Even if we have increased revenues, we need all of that to keep the situation stable," McGovern said.

Finneran and McGovern said there also are no signs that the Massachusetts economy, mired in recession, has started to pick up, nor has the national economy.

The Weld administration also has warned against a return to higher spending.

In a speech Thursday to the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, Administration and Finance Secretary Peter Nessen said spending restraint is still needed to keep the state from falling back into a fiscal mess.

Nessen warned that as word gets out that the state is slightly ahead on revenues, advocates will start a "feeding frenzy" trying to scoop up money when there isn't money available.

Finneran said one-time savings and non-tax revenues make up as much as $1 billion of the current budget.

"There's all that uncertainty hanging over FY92, so the extent revenue growth is a little better, I'm delighted to see it," Finneran said.

"We knew if we were going to make an error in revenue projections, we were going to make it on the side of caution," he said.

The chief House budget writer said the projection of $230 million from selling surplus assets is shaky at best and that the Weld administration has a difficult task if it is to achieve the Medicaid savings projected in the budget. "

"It's so easy in our business to lose sight of the fact we walk on a road that's a long road," Finneran said. "I try to present a long-term perspective and say, folks, you can't play with fire."

Finneran acknowledged that some critics have accused Democrats of dancing to Weld's tune on budgetary issues, but he said the reason is simple-the state faced, and still faces, a fiscal crisis.

"In times of emergency-and that's what we're in and nobody should be mistaken about that-the differences between people narrow significantly," Finneran said. "This is an emergency and literally the most extreme choices have to be made."

McGovern also predicted continued cooperation among herself, Finneran and Nessen on budget issues.

"All three of us appear to be pretty consistent. I don't see the kind of disagreement that might have existed in the past. We get by it by not overspending, by being very conservative and very cautious," she said.

Students travel to Cape Verde, discover democracy and roots

By DANIEL J. LYONS
Collegian Staff

Three University of Massachusetts students from the Cape Verde Student Alliance traveled this summer to Cape Verde to examine the country's new democracy and their own roots.

"I've been wanting to do this since I was a kid," said junior communications major Malkes Gomes. "I was born here, but I'm a Cape Verde decendent. In America, I grew up around a lot of Cape Verdians and Cape Verdian culture. [I wanted] to go and actually see everything I grew up with and learned about here.

"After I graduate, I'd like to go over there for a couple of years and work for a year or two teaching English. Just to give back a little bit," he said.

Along with Gomes, Nicole Roberts, a senior in psychology, and Manuel Alves, a sophomore engineering major also traveled to Cape Verde.

"I didn't know much about Cape Verde until I got [to UMass]," said Roberts. "It was more out of curiosity to see what the heritage is like there, the style of living. Also to find family there."

Alves was born in Cape Verde and spent half his life there.

"I grew up there and I moved here at the age of 10," Alves said. "I was very young in 1975 — when Cape Verde gained independence — about six years old. I was old enough to know what was going on, but I didn't understand it."

Alves explained that before the independence, Cape Verde was a Portuguese colony. "When the government changed I was scared," he said. "It didn't effect me that much, I just heard about it.

"I enjoyed it a lot because when I left I was very young and the impression I left with of Cape Verde was of a place that was very poor and everything was very primitive," Alves said. "When I was there I found out otherwise....back then, there were no roads to go anywhere. So if you had to go to the hospital or you had to mail a letter, you had to go on foot and it took usually half a day to walk there. And now there are cars everywhere."

The 10 islands that make up the Cape Verde chain lie off the western coast of Africa and were discovered in 1460 by the Portuguese.

Gomes said the first Portuguese settlers included clergy, political exiles, criminals, government officials, Jewish exiles and slaves from West Africa.

"Basically those two cultures formed the Cape Verde culture or Crioulo culture we have today," Gomes said.

Gomes explained that Cape Verde has been under control by PAICV, the Partida Africana Independencia Cape Verde for 15 years. The second party, MPD, Movemento Para Democracy, started early this year and won the country's first free election.

"It was good to see that there were free elections and that it really ran smoothly. Because most of the time when you see countries that have free elections, people are going crazy, wars are starting. I'm just glad to see that there is some kind of change. Fifteen years is a long time to be under one kind of government. I'm anxious to see in 1995, when the next election is, how well this MPD party is going to do," Gomes said.

"While there, we saw the effects of the election, at the time it was written on the walls, 'Vote for PAICV' or 'Vote for MPD,' a lot of things like that," Alves said.

He continued, "[MPD] are starting to do things and haven't done much yet. While we were there they were doing elections for Mayors and things like that. We'll see what happens."

The Cape Verde Student Alliance was founded in 1982 and is located in 401 New Africa House in Lower Central.

"[The Alliance's] purpose is for us to preserve our culture and our history throughout the Five College area, to make people aware on campus and in the Five College area, and also to provide social and economic support for our members," Gomes said.

"Most people come from rural areas and don't know who Cape Verdians are. You tell them Cape Verdian and they think you're from Cape Cod or something like that," Alves said. "We're here to let them know who we are and about our culture."

Professor receives one-year fellowship

By JOSH REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

Don't believe your grandparents. As long as there has been a "traditional" Christmas there has been glitz and tinsel to match.

"I don't think the Grinch ever really had to steal Christmas," said Stephen Nissenbaum, professor of history at UMass.

Though it is a myth common to many generations he said, "there never was such a thing as a true, spiritual Christmas."

Although he could not say for certain just when chocolate Christmas calendars arrived, the commercialization is nothing new.

"It's clear that by the 1840s some people were already tired of the glut of presents" and the chore of searching for a meaningful and affordable gift, he said.

The American Antiquarian Society has granted Nissenbaum a one-year fellowship to study the evolution of Christmas in America during the 1800s.

Nissenbaum was one of three scholars to receive fellowships from the historical society.

At the beginning of the 19th century, he said, the holiday season was an "occasion for public rowdiness." Nissenbaum believes practices such as "wassailing", which was essentially aggressive begging, became unacceptable due to changes in American society.

"Christmas became commercialized as it became domesticated," he said, contrary to what many people believe, there never was a purer, cleaner Christmas.

Christians worldwide rejected and suppressed the pagan rituals of the winter solstice until the church arbitrarily selected December 25 as the birthdate of Jesus of Nazareth, said Nissenbaum.

There was no biblical or historical precedent to suggest that, or any other date, he said.

The funding for his fellowship was provided by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Nissenbaum has taken the year off from UMass to use the American Antiquarian Society's research library in Worcester.

Cities' mayoral races indicative of Bay State's political situation

By CECI CONNOLLY
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — One year ago, voters went to the polls in record numbers to deliver devastating blows to Bay State incumbents. The people spoke, ushering in a Republican governor and treasurer and doubling the GOP presence in the state Senate.

This fall, several politicians, including three prominent Democratic mayors, are packing it in, not even risking the wrath of voters.

In Boston, Secretary of State Michael Connolly says Mayor Raymond Flynn's run for a third term is such a sleeper the real contest is for the lowest voter turnout in history.

As is generally the case, non-partisan municipal and special legislative races slated for Tuesday Sept. 24 are not expected to generate the interest last year's statewide election did.

"In normal circumstances, preliminary turnouts run about 40 percent," Connolly said. That compares to a 75 percent turnout last year and an 82 percent turnout in the 1988 presidential race.

But candidates and pundits are anxious for a second reading on the mood of Massachusetts voters.

"The anger and resentment that peaked in 1990 will have a spillover effect in 1991," predicted Lou DiNatale, a senior associate at the University of Massachusetts' McCormack Institute.

Gerry Chervinsky, head of the polling group KRC Communication Research, projected that communities with money problems will see more voters at the polls.

Springfield Mayor Mary Hurley, who has battled with unions in the past year, announced in February she was taking herself out of the running to concentrate on budget woes. "White flight" to the suburbs has become a major issue in the six-way battle to replace her.

The candidates are debating strategies for keeping the middle class, said Hurley's aide Tim Sheehan. "They're basically saying Springfield needs to be able to retain people who make over a certain amount of money."

In Brockton, six candidates are arguing over how to lead an ailing city that has laid off 600 workers this summer.

This Tuesday marks the third mayoral election in Fall River in six months. The city's unemployment rate has recently teetered near 18 percent.

Money is not expected to play a major role in Boston's mayoral election. Chervinsky, whose recent poll gave Flynn a 71 percent favorability rating, said the mayor is one of the most popular politicians in the state.

Flynn's ever-increasing national role in politics, as head of the U.S. Conference of Mayors and a rumored vice-presidential contender, may present some problems with the home crowd.

"The mayor seems to be more concerned with a national agenda and a statewide agenda more than he is with the problems of the city," said one opponent, Boston Teacher's Union President Edward Doherty.

Crime and race relations are two other prominent themes raised by the challengers.

Rev. Graylan Ellis-Hagler has attacked the mayor for failing to enforce a requirement that at least half of the construction workers on city jobs be Boston residents and a high percentage be women and minorities.

"We need to return capital back to the residents of the neighborhoods," said Ellis-Hagler, the founding pastor of the Church of the United Community in Roxbury.

"The mayor still enjoys a considerable degree of popularity in communities of color," said task force president Joyce Ferriabough.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Bigger isn't necessarily better at UMass

What constitutes the average UMass student? Is he/she/it a sensitive, caring intelligent individual who desires only to be loved and understood? Is he/she/it a beer guzzling, sex crazed mutant? Or are those people only in Southwest? We shall examine this topic in a two-part series aptly titled "The Day I Was Killed by 12,000 Angry Southwest Residents."

Part 1: The Intellectual Mind (or lack thereof).

A friend of mine and I were sitting in our anthropology class the other day, vaguely paying attention when we overheard something that we thought was pretty funny. "That was pretty funny," said my friend.

Our professor slowly, calmly explained to all of us, some 200 people or so, that we could do an extra-credit report as long as it had something to do with the class.

Done?

Now for the professor to have to say something like this, he must have had several conversations similar to this one in the past:

"Professor?"

"Yes?"

"Here's my report comparing Satan and Macbeth as tragic protagonists."

"This is Anthropology."

(Pause. Student thinks.) "So?"

(Professor grabs a handy femur and repeatedly bashes head of student.)

Basically, my friend and I thought the professor was kidding because we didn't think anyone was that mentally backwards.

Jared Blaut

But no one else laughed. No one else chuckled. No one else reacted in any way, unless you want to count the guy who leaped out of his seat, screamed "I'm a chicken! I'm a chicken! Cluck! Cluck!" and proceeded to peck his way through the aisles until the chefs from Franklin D.C. came.

It was at this moment that it occured to me that handing in papers about Anthropology in Anthropology class was a novel idea to a lot of people. It was a whole new approach that they had never thought of before. This got me thinking about just what kind of person goes to this mental vacuum that is the University of Massachusetts.

If you all saw the Collegian a little while back which showed the number of people who applied to UMass versus the number that were accepted you will realize, as I did, that this is the first school ever to accept 110 percent of its applicants. You know, I thought it was a little strange when in December I received a letter which read, in part:

Dear Jared Blaut:

Did you know, Jared Blaut, that you may have already been accepted to the University of Massachusetts? Yes, Jared Blaut, the school is very interested in Florida residents like yourself who are interested in Journalism and Cat Mutilation and who have combined S.A.T. scores over 600. To find out whether you, Jared Blaut, have been accepted, scratch off..."

And so on. So you see, UMass was trying to get students the old-fashioned way. Begging.

By accepting the better half of the free world, UMass has somewhat lowered the quality of the "mental gene pool" on campus, so to speak. Am I saying people are stupid? No, I'm not. Why? Because I enjoy living to eat again at Franklin. No, that's not true either. Allow me to get serious for a moment.

Let's examine the facts: the academic staff is constantly being reduced, while the number of students is being enlarged. The more students there are, and the less choosy the admissions board is, the more basic, elementary problems they are going to have. This only wastes the time and effort of the depleted staff and the majority of students who have to discuss basic facts over and over for the benefit of the few. This in itself lowers the academic quality of the school. The lower the academic quality, the less chance UMass has of getting the intelligent students it need to hold onto its reputation as one of the better public universities.

Perhaps I'm being overly pessimistic. Perhaps you disagree with what I'm saying. Perhaps you're thinking of leaving obscene messages on my phone relating to what you think of me and my ancestors. If you are, I have only one thing to say:

This is usually a humor column.

Jared Blaut is a UMass student

Are UMass unions part of budget cut problem?

The papers read, "Budget woes continue." It's such a common headline that most people have grown comfortable paying over $7,000 for an education that used to cost under $5,000

Peter Kasperowicz

Administrators will tell you "It's still the best deal around," as if that justifies increasing tuition until it's just below the national average. If everyone were that complacent, mankind would still be without electricity ("...But honey, everyone else has to read by candlelight...")

In fact, the cost of UMass has recently stopped being the best deal around, no matter what you're told by administrators, and the signs are all too obvious. Enrollment is down. A lot of my friends have transferred out of state and will save money even though they may need an extra year of school.

Of course, the recession/depression couldn't come at a worse time for public universities. The next five or six incoming classes will come from a generation that is about 13 percent smaller than the generations just ahead of us. Even if the cost of UMass stayed the same, enrollment would drop. As I told my brother (a C student in high school), it's a good time to do poorly; colleges are taking everybody.

However, as the other saying goes, stuff happens. Changes in population and economics call for changes in management and tactics. The price of UMass has soared because there are fewer students, meaning less money. To counter that, the University has made some tough but necessary choices; with all the faculty cuts, students per classroom is about the same or lower compared with 10 years ago.

But it's still not enough; the unions are still sucking up the cash. Everyone is unionized, and, as anyone at UMass will tell you, you can't fire people in the union. Go ahead, ask someone. They'll tell you, "Our hands are tied by the union." They'll tell you that their way of dealing with the recession/depression is to wait for enrollment to rise again.

My question is, "What are their management tools?" Are they stuck with paying for hundreds of people they don't even need? Are they completely powerless to run their own school? Will the last check UMass endorses be to some electrician who hasn't even lifted a finger for six months?

You can get rid of the union, but to do so, you have to get rid of their jobs. It is possible, and it's happening a lot these days. If UMass administrators choose to keep paying for an overstaffed staff, then rising tuitions are partly, maybe mostly, their fault. On the other hand, if the administrators choose to actually manage the university in a time of crisis, then they should cut the fat out of the budget.

But it won't happen, and here's why: Many administrators are in unions themselves, and they don't want to rock the boat.

It would seem that UMass will recover only when one of two things occur. The administration could let go of the unions and save money that will otherwise end up in the toilet. If they keep their belief that the union shouldn't be tampered with, then maybe the administrators should be let go. If they have no power to manage, then they're an even bigger rip-off than the unions. After all, their hands are tied.

Collegian letter policy restrictive

Sometimes we must write letters which we don't want to write, but it is our civic duty to write them. This is one of these letters. Being a woman of letters, I write them in order to receive a response. Being an epic poetess in the atomic age of patriarchal domination, I would hope my letters would cause public concern and, therefore, public controversy. Great ideas change public opinions through controversial dialogue which is the reason why Thomas Jefferson thought controversy is the essence of democracy. This is why editorial pages of a newspaper are the most important pages because it allows ordinary citizens to exercise their right of freedom of speech. There is nothing more exciting in life, except for coming face to face with one's true love, than an editorial page with an active dialogue between letter writers.

The Collegian's editorial policy cutting off the public from being able to respond to letters is cutting off the head of democracy. I hope this letter will cause the editor to reconsider his policy and change his standpoint on public response to letters. Isn't the editor's job to inspire public dialogue rather than to stifle creative thinking, to be a bridge to democratic action, rather than a bureaucrat of indoctrination?

Ducks have the most fun

Many of you have probably noticed that a few things are different around here this semester. It seems the winds of change have been blowing in Amherst.

For instance, voice mail, once only an "elitist" option, has now been made available to the rest of us absolutely (and thankfully) free of charge. Recycling bins have seemingly reproduced and now inhabit space in each of our dorm rooms. And one other startling change comes to my mind.

Elizabeth Stringer

Have you noticed them? They have grown in numbers. Just last semester they were only one organization among many, a little fish in a big sea. However, towards the end of last semester, they met secretly to decide how to integrate themselves further into the UMass community. They held their own version of rush. They were selective in their membership, trying to keep to their roots and accept only members who exemplify their standard.

They travel in packs but are not afraid to go out on the campus alone. They are very confident and jovial, and can be heard laughing aloud practically the whole day long. They have beady eyes and large noses, and sleep during the day with their heads tucked under their wings.

Yes, you guessed it: They have multiplied and organized themselves, and their home base is the Campus Pond...Ducks Unite Collectively for Kicks (D.U.C.K.) is a growing and powerful force this semester.

Returning students: recall if you will the mass reproduction that occured at the end of last semester. You saw the fluffy baby duckies. You called them adorable. You went to admire them at the pond. You never thought that they would grow up so fast and become so important.

Recently, under fire from equal rights activists, they were forced to admit a few members with related interests. Although the two new members, who are easily spotted among the clone like masses of ducks, initially had a difficult time feeling accepted among their peers, things have changed. The initiation of these two members, who incidently hold honorary seats on the D.U.C.K. Congress, has spurred the start of a new committee to encourage members of different backgrounds to join.

Call me crazy, but I'm thinking of joining. Last night a couple of friends and I dropped by the pond to see what their lifestyle was like. Although it was late, they were all very alive and friendly, especially when they saw that we had come bearing gifts: stale bread for everyone.

So this semester, if you are thinking of getting involved, go D.U.C.K.. But don't forget about our other invaluable groups also. UMass offers a wide variety of support, athletic, educational and intellectual groups, and that's only to name a few. The moral: If it's out there, it's in here: the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Ahh, UMass. The place where majorities become minorities, even to ducks.

Duncan song and dance a comical fiasco

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Comic. If I had to choose one adjective to describe the solo performance of "To Dance is to Live: Isadora Duncan," as choreographed and danced by Julie Ince Thompson, that would be it.

This attempt at dancing, singing, and reciting poetry to narrate the story of Isadora Duncan's life left me with a sick feeling in my stomach. I paid three bucks to feel that way.

Isadora Duncan, born in San Francisco over a century ago, was a pioneer of modern dance. She rejected the restraints of ballet technique and costuming. Instead, she performed in tunics and barefeet. She created dance schools and this new art form. She was inspired by the movement of nature (the swaying of the leaves on the trees.)

Ms. Duncan also gave birth to two children who died in a tragic car accident in 1913. She married the young, peasant poet Sergei Esenin in 1921. He left her in 1923, and committed suicide in 1925. In September of 1927, her scarf caught in the wheel of her sports car and strangled her.

This was not exactly a life that should be narrated comically.

Close your eyes and imagine Ms. Thompson standing tall and majestic, with her tacky barrettes glinting under the spotlights and a purple tunic floating about her twitching frame. This was an unusual performance.

Ms. Thompson's costumes, flowy and and a bit reminiscent of early Greek sculpture, were designed by Penelope Gardner who held the position of Director of Costumes for the Boston Ballet.

The performance was divided into two acts: the Early and the Later Years. The second half was decidedly better. "Better than what?" you ask.

Oh, the first act was chuck full of great poetic lines like, "hands touching my solar plexus" and "I dance of California." The script was written by Ruth Whitman who actually wants to publish this next Spring.

As the first act progressed, the audience was treated to an interesting interpretation of Isadora Duncan "mating" with her first love, Gordon Craig. Mind you, this is a solo performance. It felt as if I'd just switched on MTV and was forced to watch Madonna writhing to "Like a Virgin!" But Madonna is better at writhing than Ms. Thompson.

But then, hold on to your seats! After the twitching, the gyrating, and the lame dialogue, our heroine starts to sing. And this is not a voice to be used on the stage. In the shower-ALONE-maybe. It was flat and embarassing to listen to.

If it were up to me, I'd tell Ms. Thompson to stay behind the scenes. She has a choreographer's credentials, not a singer's.

I don't mean to come off as overly negative. I'm more than happy to give credit where it's due. She did make me laugh. And when Ms. Thompson flitted across the stage with her sheer, green shawl, I was impressed. This was a moment when she did seem genuinely moved by the music. May I even say: "trembling with passion?" Her hand gestures were fluid and expressive, but this artist flips her hair around more than a flirting freshman.

The music, written by UMass Professor Salvatore Macchia, was one redeeming characteristic of this production. It was moody and emotional.

In the second half, Ms. Thompson was exceptionally good (and loud) at portraying Isabella Duncan's grief upon hearing that her kids had drowned. Ms. Thompson gave an extremely chilling display, yelling "black on white" over and over to describe the children's black coffins on the white snow.

The audience laughed along with the narration, when we were told that when Isadora's peasant husband left her he took all of her underclothes with him to give to his sister and mother.

The dance sequence after Sergei's death was interesting and inspired also. I became optimistic. This was evoking emotional responses from the audience around me. Her grief was palpable.

And then there was the ending. It was an inappropriate "ode to the America" which shattered the mood and attempted to sugarcoat what had obviously been a very tumultuous, painful life story.

Chronicle photographer and writer present family farms

By MELISA CANLI
Collegian Staff

The neatly-framed black and white photographs exude a sense of history. One can almost smell the newly-overturned soil and feel its comforting, soft texture. The sounds of dairy cows waiting impatiently to be milked, the rumbling of a tractor in the distance. . .all these senses are awakened with the "Founding Farms: Five Massachusetts Family Farms 1638-Present" exhibit at Hampden Gallery.

The work was put together by UMass Campus Chronicle photographer Stan Sherer and Chronicle writer Michael Gery. Both were present at the reception I attended and were very willing to discuss their project.

The show consists of 50 photographs taken of five families who have kept the same farm in the family for over 300 years. The farms elected were Appleton, Barker, Arrowhead, Belden, and Scott. They represent both Eastern and Western Massachusetts. Due to lack of space, the exhibit was narrowed down to four families and some photos were taken out to avoid cramming them all into a small room.

After working as the Three County Fair photographer for six years, Stan was given a fellowship by Amherst College to do a documentary study of agriculture in Western Massachusetts. The same year, the State Department of Agriculture recognized the Bicentennial Farms of Massachusetts. Out of the 45 farms, 9 had been run by the same family for over 300 years.

Stan remarked he was very moved by this and decided to take on the project to provide the families and farms with further recognition. It took him a year to complete the field work. When asked why he chose to photograph in black and white only, Stan replied that he sticks to this medium due to the direct emotional contact it has with the viewer and the way black and white strips the veneer to expose the deeper meaning of his photography.

Michael decided to collaborate with Stan on the project because after interviewing many farmers he grew interested in this sector of the economy.

He pointed out the Eastern Massachusetts farmers were under more pressure from real estate development than Western Massachusetts. He said there was a little more breathing room in the Western portion of the state. He has a lot of respect for farmers who work very hard. He and Stan worked six months to raise $25,000 for the project.

Michael stated it was appropriate for the last show to be held at UMass since UMass has been very supportive. They are both very thankful for the public service grant they received from the University and help from their other sponsors.

The photos and accompanying text are very down to earth and straightforward. In one corner of the room there is a six minute soundtrack set up comprised of excerpts from interviews with farmers about the nature of farming. The peoples' statements are very poignant as they speak about their past and the value of learning to care for a slice of the earth which provides them with the very fabric of their lives.

The "Founding Farms" collection will be expanded and published as a book by the UMass Press in the Spring/ Summer of 1992. Keep your eyes open for the book and in the meantime take a walk into Hampden Gallery in Southwest to ger the comforting feeling that some of the ancestral roots of Massachusetts still exist and remain embedded in the precious soil that the farmer covets.

Founding Farms: Five Massachusetts Family Farms 1638-Present will be shown through Friday, September 27, in Hampden Gallery.

Soccer splits weekend road games

Defeats California 3-1, loses to Wisconsin 1-0

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team achieved a split this weekend at the Wisconsin Invitational. The Minutewomen (2-1) beat California 3-1 on Saturday before dropping a 1-0 decision to Wisconsin yesterday.

"This was a good test for us, I know where my team is now in its development," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "It is good to get a split against this type of competition."

UMass, ranked No. 13 in the nation, simply did not have the depth to hold off seventh ranked Wisconsin.

"Wisconsin is a very deep team and we aren't that deep, we just lost it physically in the second half and they were able to wear us down," Rudy said.

In the 65th minute, Wisconsin's Kari Maijala drove down the right side, beat UMass' Heidi Kocher and crossed the ball towards the far post where Janet Newinski headed it in.

Massachusetts had their opportunities in the first half but they were unable to put the ball behind All-American goalie Heather Taggart.

In the first half Taggart denied Tracey Arwood on a one-on-one bid after Arwood had driven up the end line. Later in the half Kim Eynard crossed a ball to Colleen Milliken who redirected it past Taggart only to have the shot stopped by a defender.

In the second Polly Hackathorn had a one-on-one only to have a bone jarring collision with Taggart leaving Hackathorn denied on the play and down on the field. She was carried off due to a bruised shin.

"It is becoming common place for us to have all these collisions," Rudy said. "That is the way we play though, we are a tough team with a fighting mentality. Still sometimes it is like you are watching a cartoon.

"They were the better team but when we get in better shape we are not afraid of them, we know we can beat them," he said.

In Saturday's game UMass dominated No. 20 California. "We made the most of our opportunities in that game," Rudy said. "They are a good team but we just did what it took to win."

In the 20th minute Holly Hellmuth headed in a corner kick from Paula Wilkens to put UMass on the board. Later in the half Eynard broke free on the left flank and from the top of the penalty circle drilled a shot into the far corner.

In the first minute of the second half UMass cleared out a California corner kick and Michele Woodside played the ball to Eynard for her second tally of the day.

Paula Wilkens reinjured her already gimpy ankle against California. It swelled up in the second half and she saw only limited time the rest of the weekend.

Briana Scurry was strong in both games collecting eight saves against California and nine versus Wisconsin.

"Scurry was terrific this weekend," Rudy said. "She is coming on as one of the best goalies in the country."

field hockey

More space for UMass allowed the team to step up its attack and punch in the third goal. The team finally broke through on a penalty corner shot, as Tara Jelley put the ball in an open net after beating the goalie.

After that, it was the defensive play that helped UMass hang on.

"We fended them off," Hixon said. "Temple beat Syracuse and North Carolina so on paper for us, this is looking great."

UMass may not have felt so great playing in the dreary and wet weather Sunday, but they rolled on with two second-half goals to beat UNH 2-1. The Minutewomen, according to assistant coach Heather Lewis, "totally dominated" the Wildcats.

Sherlan Cabralis had a big day, as she scored the first goal and assisted on the second one, a shot by Jelley. The team outshot UNH 26-7, and amassed 19 penalty corners to UNH's two.

The Wildcats broke the shutout bid with 1:54 left in the game on a goal by forward Cheri Toupin.

Men's tennis beats UNH, evens record

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team evened its record at 1-1 Friday, when it defeated the University of New Hampshire Wildcats, 5-4. The teams split six singles matches and UMass captured two of the three doubles matches, with the first doubles match deciding the overall match.

UMass' Lloyd Teitelbaum played first singles, despite a hamstring injury that hurt him in his loss to UNH's Mike Damiani, 2-6, 6-3, 3-6. Teitelbaum fell to 1-1 on the year.

Minuteman Tim Lipsky won the second singles match in straight sets, 6-3, 6-2, over Marc Bessette. Lipsky improved his own record to 2-0, and has not lost a set this season.

UMass took the third singles match as well, as Paul Audet topped Mike Costello, 6-1, 7-6 (7-5). Audet also improved his personal record to 2-0.

In the fourth singles match, UNH found a winner in Peter King, who defeated Len Levine, 6-2, 1-6, 6-4. Levine has yet to win a match this season.

Keith Murray won the fifth singles match for UMass by beating Pete Kaufman in straight sets, 6-3, 6-3. Murray's record improved to 2-0, and he too has yet to lose a set this season.

In the sixth singles match, UMass' Steve Davis fell to Wildcat Matt Reun, 6-2, 3-6, 6-3. Davis' record fell to 0-2, but he is playing in his first varsity season, and he has taken both his matches to a third set.

The Minutemen and Wildcats entered doubles competition tied 3-3. Lipsky and Murray played second doubles, and lost to Costello and King, 5-7, 6-0, 3-6.

Levine and David Kleinman were once again the third doubles tandem and they completed a strong straight set victory over Bessette and Reun, 6-1, 6-1. "[They] played solid doubles," said UMass coach David Rivera, "they got a lead and completely rolled."

The count stood at 4-4 following eight matches. And what of the first doubles match, which pitted Teitelbaum and Audet against Wildcats Damiani and D.J. Record (yes, that's his real name)?

This match went to UMass, and it gave the Minutemen their first victory of 1991. But it took until almost dark before the newly paired Teitelbaum and Audet wrapped up a 7-5, 4-6, 6-4 win.

time to panic," said Holy Cross coach Mark Dufner, who improved his record at Holy Cross to 50-5-1.

Reid said, "I told them they needed to score two more times and use up at least 17 minutes of the clock."

The Crusaders defense stopped the Minutemen to open the third quarter. Then Ciaccio (21-40, 239 yds and one TD) hit Fuller with a short pass and watched as he dove in for the touchdown to make it 14-9. Pignio's extra point made it 14-10.

Two drives later, Fuller soared over the top from two yards out to put the Crusaders ahead for good 16-14.

They added another touchdown eight seconds into the fourth quarter when Fuller scampered 27 yards down the sideline for his third touchdown of the game making it 22-14. Pignio could have put the game out of reach but missed his second straight extra point.

The Minutemen stormed back all the way to the Holy Cross 38-yard line. Then, Bledsoe ran for 12 yards to the Crusader 26 and it appeared that they were on their way to a potential game tying score. However, as was typical of the afternoon, there was a flag on the play and the Minutemen were penalized for holding. Four plays later they had to punt.

"Penalties killed us," Reid said. "I don't think they [Holy Cross] stopped us, we stopped ourselves."

UMass was penalized 11 times for 114 yards.

offset their knowledge of our defense, but that didn't work either."

The Minutemen have nine returning starters, not including the injured Mario Perry, from last year's defense that was ranked second in the nation in Division I-AA. Both Reid and Hodges said that the cure to this year's defensive woes doesn't include any major changes.

"I think we have an outstanding unit," Reid said.

Hodges said, "I don't think that the next step is changing personnel. I think the next step is to make sure that we understand that we have to play defense as a unit not as a bunch of individuals."

"We have to play together," Williams said. "That's the only way to win a football game."

Hodges said, "It's basic defense. We've got to get back to doing the things we know how to do and do those things well."

"We'll sit down as a defensive staff and really analyze this one, big time, and find out what went wrong," Reid said.

Crusaders keep Minutemen on skids 22-20

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Holy Cross (1-0) ran their unbeaten streak on opening day to 12, as they defeated the University of Massachusetts (0-2) 22-20 on the strength of fullback Jerome Fuller's three touchdowns, safety Matt Morgan's knock away of a potential game tying two-point conversion and 11 UMass penalties.

In front of 13,527 fans at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, Holy Cross extended their winning streak to 10, dating back to last season, the third longest in the nation.

Holy Cross kicker, Anthony Pignio came within Morgan's deflection of being the scapegoat. He missed two extra points and a 37-yard field goal which almost cost the Crusaders a tie instead of a win.

With 1:57 left in the game and Holy Cross leading 22-14, UMass closed the margin to 22-20 as quarterback Paul Tornatore (13 completions-20 attempts, 131 yards and two TDs) lofted a pass to Lamar Newsome (4 catches-56 yards and two TDs) in triple coverage. Newsome tipped the ball up, stumbled back into the end zone and miraculously hauled the ball in.

The Minutemen went for the two-point conversion and Tornatore's pass to Jerome Bledsoe was batted down by Morgan.

"The pass was there, I was open but he knocked it away," Bledsoe said.

Tornatore said, "I was hoping it would get there... he made a great play."

Bledsoe rushed for 131 yards on 25 carries but was outdone by his Holy Cross counterpart Fuller who gained 207 yards, averaging 8.3 yards per rush.

"I'm not sure what's wrong with the defense," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "When Holy Cross had the ball it was like running through swiss cheese."

The Crusaders amassed 484 yards of total offense, while UMass totaled 341 yards.

On their first possession of the game, Holy Cross marched 64 yards in just four plays only to see their drive stopped when Scott Assencoa picked off his first of two Tom Ciaccio passes.

Holy Cross did manage to score on their next possession as Pignio connected on a 27-yard field goal. The Minutemen did well to hold the Crusaders to three points as they stormed 62 yards down the field and had first-and-goal from the 8-yard line, where the drive eventually stalled.

Fullback Mike George carried six times and gained 34 up-the-middle-yards before John Johnson capped a 10-play, 60-yard touchdown drive with a nine yard burst into the end zone, which put UMass ahead 7-3 after Jim Maguire's extra point.

Assencoa's second interception led to UMass' next TD. This time Tornatore hit Newsome in the corner of the end zone just before he fell out of bounds to make it 13-3. Maguire's extra point made it 14-3 and that was the count at halftime as it was three-and-out for the Crusaders' offense the rest of the half.

Lady harriers plagued with injuries

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Correspondent

Maybe the UMass women's cross country team never should have left the bus.

Already missing star runner Kelly Liljeblad, the Minutewomen suffered injuries to both Kim Liljeblad and Maureen Meldrim shortly after arriving at Franklin Park Saturday for their meet with Boston College and UMass-Lowell. The Minutewomen placed second.

As the team was exiting the bus Kim Liljeblad stepped on a nest of bees, suffering approximately 10 stings. Liljeblad was still able to run, finishing the course in 20:23, but, "Is capable of running much stronger than that," according to coach Julie LaFreniere.

Adding to the Minutewomen's problems, Maureen Meldrim suffered a pulled muscle in her lower back midway through the race, and dropped to 10th place, third for the team.

"We don't think Maureen's injury is anything to worry about, her back is just real tight right now and hopefully it will loosen up in the next few days," LaFreniere said.

Boston College swept the top three spots, with Heather Grimshaw winning in 18:49. UMass' top runner was Tricia Mathiesen, who ran in her first meet for the Minutewomen. She finished fourth with a time of 19:43.

UMass' next finisher was senior captain Michelle St. Laurent, who finished sixth in 19:43.

"If I said I wasn't disappointed, I'd be lying, but considering everything and with it being our first meet, hopefully this will shake the dust off us and get us ready for Springfield next week." LaFreniere said.

"Tricia was very impressive in her first race and as always Michelle ran a very strong race," LaFreniere said. "The freshmen [Cheryl Lyons and Julie Moreau] ran very well for us, finishing fourth and fifth for the team with identical marks of 20:20."

UMass wasn't the only team hit with injuries. BC was without its top runner, Diane Connolly, as was Lowell, who without their top runner finished third with 81 points and their best finisher in 11th place. UMass finished with 45 points and BC had 18.

"BC looked very strong, while Lowell really wasn't a factor," LaFreniere said. "We didn't run near our potential and if we expect to win Saturday we need to run in a tighter pack."

Where is the defense?

Holy Cross racks up 484 yards on offense

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

The most popular question after the University of Massachusetts football team allowed 484 total yards to Holy Cross Saturday was quite obviously; "What happened to UMass' defense?"

However, no one could provide an obvious answer.

"I'm not sure where we went wrong on defense," head coach Jim Reid said. "It became evident on the second drive that we couldn't stop them. They went through us like a hot knife goes through butter."

The Minutemen allowed 239 yards in the air and 245 on the ground, 207 by Crusader fullback Jerome Fuller. Fuller's delayed cutbacks resulted in UMass defenders overpursuing the plays.

"We made a lot of mental mistakes," defensive coordinator Mike Hodges said. "Rather than us taking care of our area of responsibility we were just chasing the ball and giving them the cutbacks."

Fuller, who ran for only 450 yards all of last season, averaged 8.3 yards per carry, including two rushing touchdowns and a 17-yard TD reception.

"We didn't have enough consistency and they just exploded on us," said UMass cornerback Vaughn Williams. "Whenever you face the run-and-shoot, you have to shut down the run and today we just didn't do that."

The defense only allowed three first half points. However, Holy Cross still racked up 220 yards before intermission. UMass outside linebacker Scott Assencoa had two interceptions to halt Holy Cross' crusade.

"Let's face it," Reid said. "If they [Holy Cross] didn't make any turnovers, they score 54 points."

Holy Cross head coach Mark Duffner stuck with his balanced offensive game plan the entire contest. Holy Cross' backfield carried the ball 35 times and quarterback Tom Ciaccio attempted 40 passes.

"I think they ran more than we thought they were gonna run," Williams said.

Reid said that former UMass assistant coach and now Holy Cross assistant William McGovern (UMass back-up quarterback Dave's brother) contributed to reading the Minutemen's defensive sets.

"They knew our game plan very well," Reid said. "We tried to throw a couple of new things at them which we thought would

Field hockey remains unbeaten after two weekend wins

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Regardless of the crummy weather, it was a perfect weekend for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team. They defeated both of their opponents and maintained an undefeated record.

UMass beat arch rival Temple 3-1 Friday at home, and left Durham, New Hampshire Sunday with a 2-1 win over the Wildcats.

In Friday's match, the Minutewomen were greeted by a Temple team every bit as tough as they expected. However, UMass proved tougher as Dawn Trumbauer broke a 1-1 tie at 10:32 of the second half, and Tara Jelley punched in a penalty corner shot with 6:30 left to put the game away.

The team looked timid and apprehensive in the first half. UMass overcame the early game jitters when Jenn Salisbury scored her fourth goal of the season late in the first half.

Salisbury showed her athleticism as she weaved by one defender, through another, and shot the ball in, beating Temple goalie Amy Baker. The goal came with only 53 seconds left in the half and gave UMass momentum going into the second half.

"It gave us a huge lift because we were fighting for our lives out there," Coach Pam Hixon said. "We needed to gain our composure."

UMass' lead quickly dissipated in the second half when Temple's Toni Byard scored at 23:45. Byard's goal broke UMass goalie Philippa Scott's string of shutouts, and tied the game at 1-1.

Thanks to the stellar defense of sweeper Tracy Barclay and Scott, Temple wasn't given a chance to take the lead. The last two lines of defense did their job in stopping the few Temple breakaways.

UMass kept their offensive attack up, eventually scoring when Trumbauer nailed the ball in from the right side of the circle making the score 2-1 in favor of the Minutewomen. At that point, Temple's defensive strategy changed.

The Lady Owls decided to put an extra forward on offense, according to Hixon, which left even more room in their defense for UMass to work.

"It opened things up for us," Hixon said. "It gave us more space and allowed us to do more work across the field. We're good...when we have space."

Four demands must be met, GEO says

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Leaders of the Graduate Employee Organization said the group may engage in "decisive action" if the University of Massachusetts administration does not meet four major demands by Oct. 1, the day the GEO has set as a final contract deadline.

In May 1991, the 2,400 members of the GEO, the largest union on campus, voted to have their negotiating team obtain the following four issues on the GEO's first union contract: binding arbitration, agency shop, a health fee waiver and job security.

At that same general meeting, the GEO overwhelmingly voted for a labor action this fall if the administration does not approve the four major demands.

"I hope the administration realizes that what we're asking isn't that much," said Emily Isaacs, the co-speaker of the GEO/District 65/UAW. The GEO, which represents all UMass graduate employees such as teaching and research assistants, has been bargaining with the University for 10 months, Isaacs said.

The GEO is set to vote Oct. 1 on the elements of a contract offered by the administration, Isaacs said.

The administration's negotiating team did not budge on any of these issues at the last negotiation session on Sept. 5, Isaacs wrote in a Sept. 6 letter to the graduate employees.

"While we have reached satisfactory agreement on most of the rest of the contract's less significant issues, essentially, the Coordinating Committee and negotiating committee [of the GEO] have failed to get the administration to concede on any of the above four demands," she said in the letter.

Susan Pearson, the chief negotiator for the administration, declined comment last night.

If the administration votes against accepting the contract proposed by the GEO, Isaacs said the GEO will take "decisive action."

Isaacs said to heighten University awareness over this contract dispute, the GEO will next week kick off five days of teach-ins and sit-ins "focusing on the Chancellor's office."

The GEO has a long history of similar actions. In the spring of 1990, the GEO marched sometimes daily to the Chancellor's office and held teach-ins at the Whitmore Administration during a one-day work stoppage led by the GEO.

Centering on Whitmore, the GEO will also hold rallies and "gorilla theatre" presentations to increase the public's knowledge on the urgency of the contract negotiations.

"I think the purpose is to remind the campus community of the urgency of GEO's right to a fair, reasonable contract," Isaacs said.

"A University wants to attract quality graduate students. A good contract with the GEO will attract good students," said Isaacs. "It would be in the University's best interest to accept GEO's demands."

At last Thursday's membership meeting, it was reported that the funds being allocated to teaching assistants had been cut by 13 percent by the University, reducing the number of job openings for graduate students by 200 to 240, Isaacs said.

Judge Thomas still eluding senators

CHRISTOPHER CONNELL
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After grilling Clarence Thomas for four days, senators still don't know "what the real Thomas will do" on the Supreme Court, a Senate Judiciary Committee member says.

The conservative black judge returned yesterday to face his inquisitors for a fifth and final day before the panel turns to witnesses supporting and opposing him.

Sen. Howell Heflin (D-Ala.) said Sunday that while his own mind is not made up, Thomas probably would win confirmation if the vote were held now.

Heflin, interviewed on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" said "a good number of the moderate, conservative Democrats ... would vote for him unless he really stubs his toe."

Thomas seemed to find liberal positions acceptable on interpreting the Constitution and public housing, but he "appeared to be with the far right" in the Reagan and Bush administrations, said Heflin.

"Is he an opportunist? Is he giving answers to get confirmation?" said Heflin. "I don't really think, at this stage, we know what the real Thomas will do."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) appearing with Heflin, said some opposition to Thomas stems from fears that he will help break the Democratic Party's grip on the black vote.

Thomas "may serve as a role model to bring many African Americans to the Republican cause," said Specter.

"There's real concern among the Democrats and among the traditional leaders in the African-American community that Judge Thomas ... may bring people to a different way of thinking," he said.

Specter said "race played an enormous factor" in President Bush's choice of Thomas to succeed the retiring Justice Thurgood Marshall, the Supreme Court's first black member, and rightfully so.

With Thomas' up-from-poverty background, he is "a man who has a very, very different view of the world, a real diversity, which that court badly, badly needs," said Specter, who had questioned Thomas on his hostility to affirmative action programs despite the help he received throughout his education and career.

Thomas last week frustrated attempts by Democrats to elicit his views on abortion and other contentious topics.

During four days of sometimes grueling interrogation, Thomas was asked to square his writings and his speeches when he served in the Reagan administration with more moderate statements he made to the Judiciary Committee.

Thomas, who had written and spoken extensively about using "natural law philosophy" to interpret the Constitution, told the panel that such a theory of a higher law was not the correct way to decide cases.

He told the panel that he had an open mind on abortion, even though he once praised an anti-abortion article as a "splendid example of applying natural law."

Thomas said he had praised the article in a 1987 speech to a conservative audience to urge the group to thick about using natural law to develop a more aggressive civil rights agenda.

He insisted that he had not "endorsed or supported" the article's call for outlawing abortion.

GLB students and the roommate shuffle

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

For gay, lesbian and bisexual students living on campus, room assignments can feel a lot like Russian Roulette.

If they're really lucky, they'll get a gay roommate or a single. At the very least, they pray for a heterosexual ally.

Sometimes though, their worst fears are realized and their roommate turns out to be strongly anti-gay. Often, when this happens confrontations occur and one or the other will move out. Occasionally, violence is part of the confrontation.

Director of the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns Felice Yeskel, whose office documents and tracks homophobic incidents on campus, said GLB students living on campus deal with a wide spectrum of homophobia, ranging from the subtle to the extreme.

Yeskel said often social programming by House Councils and other student groups assume that everyone is heterosexual, which makes homosexuals feel invisible.

"On the other end, some GLB students who have come out in the residence halls have been beaten up," Yeskel said.

She also mentioned other incidents that include threatening letters and phone calls, rooms being trashed, shouts from windows and verbal confrontations.

Yeskel feels that sometimes, "there's a benefit in living with people who are different," although she stressed that "people shouldn't have to live in situations where they feel threatened or uncomfortable."

"Sometimes [GLB residents] can reach

Social diversity floor students talk

Andy was apprehensive when he discovered there were openly gay students living on his floor. His worst fears were realized when he learned his roommate was gay.

"I come from a small town where no one in my school was out as gay. Asking me to deal with this during my first week at college is just too much to ask," said Andy, a heterosexual freshman placed on a social diversity corridor.

Andy immediately arranged for a room change.

Now, two weeks later, he has a different perspective. He said he is sorry for the way he made his gay roommate feel. But he stresses that for him "learning to accept this will take time."

"At first I was shocked. It was surprising and very scary," Andy said.

But now, he says he wants to stay on the corridor and learn about people with different sexual orientations. But he stressed that people need to understand where he is coming from and how difficult it is to encounter something completely new.

Linda is a straight woman on the same floor who discovered her roommate is a lesbian.

Solzhenitsyn will return home to Russia

By MICHAEL TIGHE
Associated Press

CAVENDISH, Vt. — Dramatic political changes in the Soviet Union are certain to mean a homecoming for exiled Russian writer Alexander Solzhenitsyn.

"We'll definitely return back home to Russia," Solzhenitsyn told The Associated Press at the town's bicentennial parade. "I said a long time ago that I definitely will return and that stays intact. I'm not going to live here forever."

Solzhenitsyn said the democratic movement sweeping the Soviet Union makes his return more likely now than ever before.

"Without these events, my return was completely out of the question," he said. "Under the rule of the KGB and the Communist Party, who I always fought with, I could not return.

"These events are the ones that really opened the way for a return in the future. A return will definitely happen," Solzhenitsyn said, with his son Stephan acting as interpreter.

The Nobel Prize winner said he has not begun the process for his return and he does not know when that return will happen. But he did say that any return hinges on the Soviet government dropping the treason charge against him that led to his exile in 1974.

"The process hasn't started if for no other reason than the Soviet government hasn't yet taken away its charge of treason," he added. "They may do that in the future. That has always been a stumbling block."

Now 72, Solzhenitsyn was charged with treason and expelled for his writings.

His "Letter to the Leaders" called for many of the reforms that recently have come to pass. Those included free functioning for the Russian Orthodox church, an end to the Communist Party's monopoly on power, and independence for several of the Soviet republics.

Solzhenitsyn settled in Cavendish in 1976 with his wife, Natalia, and son, Stephan, who is now an 18-year-old student at Harvard University. He has lived as a recluse much of that time, but said he attended Saturday's bicentennial festivities because it was an important day for the town.

"It's a big rarity that you get a bicentennial. It's a big, important day," he said.

Solzhenitsyn mingled with the townspeople for much of the afternoon celebrations, shaking hands, autographing books, and posing for pictures.

In the era of glasnost ushered in by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, Solzhenitsyn's longer works have been published both in book and in serial form in the Soviet Union.

The writer is most noted for works such as "The Gulag Archipelago" and "One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich," which contained devastating descriptions of life in Soviet prison camps and broad indictments of communism's legacy.

Solzhenitsyn also said Saturday he cannot leave his Cavendish compound just yet because he is in the process of writing.

"You've got to understand that the key to it is that I have been writing here for a long time and that's a process that a writer can't just stop, pick up and leave," he said.

Jewish Holy Day begins tonight

Yom Kippur, Day of Atonement for sins, marked by prayer

By DEBRA KRIEGSMAN
Collegian Staff

One of the most solemn of Jewish holy days begins this evening at sundown, Yom Kippur, the Jewish day of atonement for sins.

Yom Kippur ends the period of T'shuvah which began 10 days ago on Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year. The word T'shuvah is derived from the word shuv, which means to turn or return.

From this comes the spirit of Yom Kippur, which is a time when Jews realize their sins and resolve not to repeat them in the future.

The Yom Kippur holiday comes from Leviticus Chapter 23 which commands, "For on this day shall atonement be made for you, to cleanse you: from all your sins before the Lord shall you be clean."

The day is to be a Sabbath day of rest and self inspection, a day of thought and prayer.

Traditionally, Jews spend the day in temple, praying for forgiveness and hoping to rectify their lives. Yom Kippur begins with Kol Nidrei, which means the first night, and is followed by a full day of prayers beginning with morning services which are concluded with Ne'ilah, closing prayers.

"The services are divided into different sections and each has it's own way of atonement," according to Rabbi Philip Graubart of the Congregation B'nai Israel in Northampton.

The holiday is observed with a fast that begins at sundown on the Eve of Yom Kippur and ends 24 hours later when a break-the-fast is held, a humble meal that follows in the somber spirit of the holy day.

The fast comes from Isaiah Chapter 57 which talks about the Lord's desire for your soul to be afflicted. The meaning of the fast has been interpreted in many ways. It is generally recognized as a penance, a time to focus the mind on the spiritual and a means of awakening compassion.

"We fast in order to help us become more sensitive to other peoples' pain. It is not penalty or punishment, but purifying, a liberating time," said University of Massachusetts Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

One aspect of this self redemption is the Enumeration of Sins, a period of prayer in which atonement takes a physical expression. Here Jews literally beat their chests in order to feel their remorse.

"It helps you get in touch with your remorse," said Perlmutter.

Another physical expression is the blowing of the shofar, the ram's horn, at the end of the day. The shofar is blown as a reminder of the redemption that the Jews ask for on Yom Kippur.

Jews also follow the holy day with a traditional mitzvah, a good deed. This year at UMass, members of Hillel have begun a food drive in which they are hoping to collect the food that would have otherwise been consumed during the period of fasting. The drive is in conjunction with the Amherst Survival Center, which is in need of non-perishable foods.

All services will be held in the Student Union Ballroom. Kol Nidrei services begin at 7 p.m. Tuesday. On Wednesday, services begin at 10 a.m. and follow through all day, concluding with the 5:30 p.m. Ne'ilah services.

The break-the-fast meal will be in the Commonwealth room following services on Wednesday.

Amherst prof talks about Israeli problems

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Gordon Levin, who has taught at Amherst College as a professor of Israeli disciplines, delivered a lecture last night at the Hillel House concerning the Israeli/Palestinian question, as well as give diverse views of the recent and highly controversial Israeli Peace Conference, which is due to be held in the near future.

Levin began with a short history of the initial conflict between the Jews and Palestinians and questions surrounding it. He stressed how the "double minority problem" played an important factor in weighing the seriousness of the present situation: how it hindered the Palestine/Israeli peace initiative in that not only Palestinians now felt to be a minority within a country over which they previously had reign, but explained that the Jews, also a minority, feel intimidated, in turn, by the Palestinians.

"The Palestinians didn't recognize the legitimacy of Zionism, which in turn created more friction between Palestinians, and the Israelis and vice versa," he said.

A woman in the small audience challenged Levin's statements and brought up the issue of human rights within the troubled region. She mentioned the reasons for the Jews' return to Palestine to be under "false religious pretences."

Several listeners asked if she had ever traveled to Israel, and if she really knew, first hand of the events

Chelsea's schools open

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

CHELSEA — Classrooms overflowed and some students had no books, but teachers still tried to teach the basics as schools finally opened Monday with this impoverished city under state receivership.

Some 1,300 students, from preschool to the eighth grade, crowded into the Williams School for opening day. Some had no books; others were placed in the wrong classroom, or had no classroom at all. Some classes overflowed with more than 40 students.

Eighty of the school system's teachers were laid off from last year. The rest didn't learn until late August whether they still had jobs, making preparations hurried. But classes went on.

"It's only by a miracle that this place is the way it is right now," said Anthony M. DiGregorio, the school's principal. "But even with all the glitches, nothing's been disastrous. And the glitches will get worked out."

DiGregorio, walkie-talkie in hand, toured the school's 53 classrooms, greeting students and explaining why rooms seemed smaller. "It's a little more crowded, which means we're all going to be a little closer together," he joked with sixth graders. "We'll be more like a family. We'll just have to hang desks from the ceilings."

In one room, a bilingual teacher was matched with monolingual students. When DiGregorio asked how many students weren't supposed to be there, a forest of hands shot up.

"We are currently looking for a teacher. When we do I'll be happy," DiGregorio told students.

Boston University, which took over Chelsea's school two years ago, requested $15.9 million for the system this year, but the city allocated $1.6 million.

The city's elementary schools have no librarians this year, and no home economics or industrial arts classes. Most business courses and half the art and physical education courses have been cut in the high schools.

Even with the problems, Terri Plona, 22, the mother of a preschooler and a third-grader, was happy her children were in school, especially since she had dropped out of high school.

"I didn't get too far in my education, so I'd like to see them do better," Plona said. "Hopefully, they'll stay open."

Chelsea High School students began the year on a new trimester system in which they attend three 90-minute classes a day. Principal Elsa Wasserman said implementation of the plan was speeded up by the layoffs, since it requires teachers to teach fewer students.

Baker, Shamir discuss Middle East peace process

By ALLYN FISHER
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Secretary of State James A. Baker III today opened talks on the Middle East peace process with Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir amid tension over the U.S. delay of loan guarantees for the Jewish state.

Baker went into a closed-door meeting with Shamir late this afternoon. They were to be joined later by aides.

Baker drove from the airport in a motorcade. When it reached a crossroads at the entrance to Jerusalem, it was pelted with tomatoes, police said. One of the cars was hit, but it was not Baker's, police said.

Baker, making his seventh visit to the region since the Gulf War, arrived in an Israel bristling over President Bush's insistence on delaying for four months Israel's request for $10 billion in U.S. loan guarantees.

Israel wants the guarantees to get favorable rates on loans for housing and employing thousands of Soviet Jewish immigrants. Bush says dealing with the request now will harm the chances of convening Middle East peace talks.

Some Israeli officials fear Washington is using the guarantees to pressure Israel to make concessions to the Arabs. Others worry the delay is to punish Israel for continuing to move Jewish settlers to the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip, home to 1.7 million Palestinians.

On Sunday, a Cabinet minister, Rehavam Zeevi, went so far as to brand Bush's remarks as lies bordering on anti-Semitism. The charge was rejected by Defense Minister Moshe Arens, but nonetheless it reflected the anger stirred by the president's remarks.

The daily Yedioth Ahronoth said statements like Zeevi's add "poisionous fuel to the fire."

"President Bush is NOT an anti-Semite," it said in an editorial. "We can manage without the loan guarantees. But without peace, we cannot."

"I am not discouraged at all" by the U.S.-Israeli rift, Baker said during a refueling stop on his flight from the Soviet Union. "We have always known there would be bumps along the way. We are going to keep working because I think the world wants peace in the Middle East."

Shortly before Baker's arrival, Shamir's top political aide said that a delay in U.S. loan guarantees was "casting a shadow" on Middle East peace efforts.

Air Force to overhaul

New plans for dramatic restructuring unveiled

By SUSANNE M. SCHAFER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Air Force is poised to announce a major overhaul that will shake the service from top to bottom, transferring dozens of generals from desk jobs to the flight line.

"We have too many generals sitting on their butt doing staff work when they would be happier and more efficient out on the flight line," Air Force Chief of Staff Merrill McPeak said recently.

The moves are some of the most dramatic changes by the Air Force since it became a separate branch of the armed services in 1947.

The overhaul, which already has begun in some areas, is McPeak's personal quest and has the backing of Air Force Secretary Donald Rice and Defense Secretary Dick Cheney.

Rice is scheduled to unveil the changes in detail Tuesday at the Air Force Association annual convention in Washington. Senior Pentagon officials discussed the changes with The Associated Press in advance of the announcement on condition of anonymity.

McPeak, a 55-year-old four-star general who flew 269 combat missions in a one-year tour of duty in Vietnam, still jumps into the cockpit of an F-15 jet to keep his qualifications up-to-date. And despite the praise garnered by the Air Force for its performance in Operation Desert Storm, McPeak insists the service can't rest on its laurels.

He's argued that the reorganization is a way to improve the combat power of the service as it's forced to become a leaner, less bureaucratic organization. The overhaul also is designed to decentralize authority, putting more responsibility in the hands of local commanders and crew chiefs.

"One base, one wing, one boss" is the motto used to describe part of the process that McPeak hopes will help the service shed an image of arrogance and free-spending, giving more authority to base commanders and crew chiefs.

Critics have derided the service as a "fraternity in uniform."

As Pentagon budgets shrink and the superpower balance shifts, change is inevitable. One quarter of the Air Force's men and women are being cut, to about 450,000 in five years. There were 904,000 Air Force personnel at its last peak, during the Vietnam era.

The basic building blocks of the tactical fighter force — its so-called air wings — will be cut from 36 to 26, and the number of bases is expected to be reduced severely. Five bases are being closed, with more in the offing.

Under McPeak's plan:

- A general rather than a colonel will be in charge on all of the service's 45 largest bases, in particular those with 4,000 or more personnel.
- Overall, the number of Air Force major commands will be reduced from 13 to 10.
- A "gradual consolidation" of the two major attack forces — the Strategic Air Command at Offutt AFB, in Omaha, Neb., and the Tactical Air Command at Langley AFB, Va. — is in the offing.

Other changes include the creation of an Air Force Intelligence Command and the deactivation of the Electronic Security Command based at Kelly AFB, Texas.

A merger of the Systems Command based at Andrews AFB and the Logistics Command at Wright-Patterson AFB, Ohio, into the Air Force Material Command at Wright-Patterson has already begun. The new organization will be in charge of managing the service's weapons systems.

Hostage release: 'incomplete step'

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — The return of 51 Shiite Muslim prisoners and the bodies of nine guerrillas by Israel was not enough to warrant releasing more Western hostages, the leader of an influential pro-Iranian group said today.

"The ball is still in their (the Israelis') court. The step was supposed to be bigger, to involve a bigger number or some of the symbols, like Sheik Abdul-Karim Obeid." Sheik Abbas Musawi said of Wednesday's prisoner and guerrilla release by Israel.

"It is an incomplete step," said Musawi, who heads the pro-Iranian Hezbollah, an umbrella group believed to oversee the kidnap factions.

Obeid, a Hezbollah cleric, was kidnapped by helicopter-borne Israeli commandos from south Lebanon in 1989.

In other developments regarding the hostage ordeal, Lebanon's highest-ranking Shiite cleric said he thought four missing Iranians and six Israeli servicemen, whose fate is tied in with the hostage issue, are dead.

Also, the reputed spiritual leader of the hostage-holding faction Islamic Jihad said he believed the hostage issue could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion if the parties involved show flexibility.

U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar is reportedly trying to work out a deal in which Israel would return hundreds of Arab detainees, Israel would receive six missing servicemen and the 11 Western hostages would be freed.

Airplane part found may lead to cause of crash that killed 14

EAGLE LAKE, Texas (AP) — The discovery of an airplane part crucial to the investigation of a commuter plane crash that killed 14 people supports the theory that 43 missing screws caused the accident, an investigator said.

Crews found the part, a 9-foot de-icing attachment, on Sunday in a farm field about three-quarters of a mile northwest of the site where Continental Express Flight 2574 crashed Wednesday.

"It was in basically the condition we had expected," said Brent Bahler, spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board.

"That should help us confirm our previous theory that the screws had not been replaced."

Investigators have speculated the de-icing boot fell off during the flight from Laredo to Houston because 43 screws were missing from the leading edge of the plane's stabilizer, a section of the tail that keeps the airplane horizontal in flight.

Baghdad blocks UN from making aerial checks for missiles

MANAMA, Bahrain (AP) — U.N. monitors have scrapped their mission after Baghdad blocked them from making their own aerial checks for long-range missiles. A Bush administration official is calling Baghdad's action a serious truce violation.

The Iraqi government defended its move Sunday, saying the use of foreign aircraft over its territory violated its sovereignty.

Instead, Iraq offered its military's Soviet-made Mig-17 helicopters and Iraqi pilots, but U.N. inspectors say the helicopters are unsafe and the pilots uncooperative.

War hero dismissed for deserting unit during gulf buildup

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — A war hero who said he was haunted by memories of Vietnam was convicted of deserting his National Guard unit during the Persian Gulf War buildup and was dismissed from the military.

Capt. Daniel A. Nightingale, 40, of North Manchester, had faced a possible 200-day jail term and a $200 fine. He was convicted Sunday.

Nightingale failed to report for a weekend drill in January. He had tried to resign from the military last November as units were being sent to the gulf. His unit was not deployed.

out — some people are only superficially homophobic — and if a gay resident can talk to them — things can quickly change," Yeskel said.

However, Yeskel stressed that in situations where GLB residents do not feel safe with their roommates or floormates, and where differences feel unresolvable, they should speak to their residence assistant or residence director to request a room change.

Jerry, an openly gay sophomore who lives in the Central Residencial Area, said he has had problems with several straight roommates while living on campus. Jerry said this semester his roommate moved out after the first day because he didn't want to live with a gay man.

"I put up an ACT-UP poster — he looked at it and ran out of the room. . . later he came back and said we needed to talk. . . he was scared," Jerry said.

"He said he'd never dealt with this before, that he was afraid of AIDS and that I would climb into bed with him at night. He said he had to move out."

Above all, he said he is tired of having to deal with homophobia.

"I would like to come here and get an education undisturbed, instead I find myself spending all my time educating people about gays and fighting to have the same rights as everyone else," he said. "I'm tired of that."

Lori, a Central Residence Area resident who is a lesbian, said she has also had difficulties with her straight roommate.

"I wish I had a different roommate that was more accepting. Mine keeps assuming things and asking me so many questions," Lori said.

"I don't have the time, the space or the desire to educate someone," Lori said. "They can do that on their own."

For Lori, emotional safety is a big issue.

"I don't feel safe in the room with her — I haven't put up any posters, anything at all that reflects who I am. . . She keeps making such a big deal out of it—I just want to be left alone."

Acceptance should be mutual, Lori said. "I don't feel uncomfortable with her as a straight woman — I feel uncomfortable with her making such a big deal about me," she said. "I'm willing to try to be accepting and deal with things if she would only accept me."

Gary, a gay sophomore who is also having difficulties with his straight roommate, said he feels bad because of the subtle messages he receives.

"He never asks me to do things with him — if I walk in on a group of his friends, they all get up and leave."

Gary said there have been no direct confrontations, but still he feels uneasy.

He said he believes that students who live on campus should have to take residential diversity classes that encourage understanding and acceptance of people's differences.

For Jerry, the bottom line is that gay residents should not have to assume the burden of educating their heterosexual peers.

"I came here to learn, not to teach," he said "Every semester I have to start over with new faces...I'm tired of it. You have to educate yourself — I shouldn't have to do it for you."

Linda says she feels she was labeled "homophobic" before she ever had a chance to prove herself.

"My lesbian roommate looked at me in horror when I walked in," Linda said. "I can't even talk to the girl because she's so scared of me."

She admits "at the beginning I was a little put off by it [living with a lesbian roommate], but now I think it's okay."

Linda especially feels rejected by residents on her floor.

"I feel like, the gay people on this floor alienate themselves — I try to say 'hi' to everyone — but they look at me like I don't know — I'm devil's spawn or something," Linda said.

Both Andy and Linda stress they want GLB residents to give them a chance.

Isaacs said the University did not consult or negotiate with the GEO over this cut.

"We had no control over how that 13 percent cut was implemented," she said.

She said graduate students are "furious" over that cut.

In addition, Isaacs said, UMass teaching assistants are paid below the national average and graduate students unfairly pay higher fees than other graduate students at other schools.

"It really depends on the administration [what our action will be]," she said.

taking place there.

Although concerned, and questioning the State of Israel's safety, Levin had some reservations over border disputes that may occur between Israel and surrounding countries. He said if the buffer zone was reduced, it may be a catalyst to invite attacks against Israel.

Other issues such as the fall of the Soviet Union and the arrival of Soviet Jews potentially living in the disputed occupied territories, were discussed.

"In the interest of the Soviet Jews, in the interest of the solidifiying a position in the Western World, and also for economic gains, it would be imperative to maintain these borders," he said.

One of the reasons for the Israeli Peace Conference was for Israel, according to Levin, "to reconcile its border disputes by taking advantage of American resources and to try to put a rest to the disputes and to devise a strategy best for the survival of Israel, and for the survival of Israel as a democracy."

Factory fire a symptom of dark side of profit motive

Would you believe that it took hundreds of men and women to produce the newspaper you're holding? Some cut the trees, others transported them to a mill. Yet others pulped the wood and still more turned the pulp into paper. Eventually, someone had to drive it to the printers.

Jeremy P. Levinson

It probably took even more people to produce and deliver the ink. Writers wrote, editors edited, photographers photographed, graphics people did whatever they do. And then, the printers printed. Today's newspaper has a long history, passing through the hands of so many making a living (or trying to) doing what they do.

We forget that almost everything we see and use is the result of many people's labor. From mattress tags to thumbtacks; food and plates; cars and car air-fresheners. If we could somehow see the work that went into those things we use everyday, our world would be turned upside-down.

Take for example a recent fire at a North Carolina poultry processing plant. A deep-fryer burst into flames. When the workers dashed for the exits they found most of them locked. The company had locked it's workers in to prevent them from stealing chickens — which I suppose is a worry when you pay workers poverty wages to raise their families with.

Twenty five workers died that day at the Imperial Food Products plant.

Anyone of conscience is outraged. Where was the law? The safety codes? As one Associated Press story put it, "Enforcement of worker safety laws apparently is scarce in North Carolina." So, we need to buckle down and enforce the law more strictly to prevent a similar tragedy from occurring.

Yet, if we look deeper into this specific example we can find a pattern of inhumanity. In fact, in this case we can follow the trail all the way to our dinner tables.

Poultry is the largest industry in the South. This $16 billion dollar industry pays poverty wages to a workforce of 150,000. Work-related injury and death rates are higher than for miners and construction workers. These people work long shifts on hot assembly lines, killing, cutting, weighing, cooking and packaging our food.

Over the past 20 years, chicken has become king of the American dinner table. In the late 60s huge corporations took over the industry and turned poultry production into something akin to automobile production.

Farmer Jones is dead.

In his place are a few industry giants. They're careful to locate plants in areas hostile to unions, fertile with poor people who might work under such conditions for so little money.

Like with everything else, production is God. As corporate America seeks to speed production more workers die and are disabled. For what? For so many, the American Dream has been reduced to surviving the work week. What did those people in North Carolina die for? One little girl whose aunt died in the fire wasn't satisfied with her own answer, "For chicken?"

Supreme Court Confirmation Ritual
TAKE 1
OKAY, A LOT OF INTRODUCTORY POLITENESS AND EXTRANEOUS COMMENTS ALL AROUND.
THEN A SENATOR ASKS ABOUT ABORTION. THE NOMINEE DOESN'T ANSWER.
THEN ANOTHER SENATOR REALLY "PRESSES IN". THE NOMINEE REFUSES "TO PREJUDGE THE ISSUE."
THE NOMINEE OFFERS VAGUE BUT NON-BINDING ASSURANCES.
ABOVE ALL, HE MUST NOT SOUND ARROGANT.
THE SENATORS THEN FOLLOW THE UNUSUAL CUSTOM THAT THE POLITICAL CRITERIA OBVIOUSLY USED TO SELECT THE CANDIDATE MAY NOT BE USED TO REJECT THE CANDIDATE.
SENATORS VOTE TO CONFIRM.
OKAY, LET'S FOLLOW THE SCRIPT AND GET THIS WRAPPED UP.
DON'T LOOK AT THE CAMERA, AND KEEP A STRAIGHT FACE.

No. Not for chicken. For profits. The chicken lands on our tables; the profits in the pockets of executives in some office far away from the factories. The workers return, hopefully, to shacks and cramped apartments, hoping to rest up for another day on the line.

This is one story. It's only chicken. The same chicken you buy at Stop 'n' Shop. And it's only a story because 25 people died last week. For us, chicken; for those workers, their lives.

If our chicken dinners could talk, they'd scream. But what about everything else? Our shoes, our cocktails at local bars, our books, our clothes? These things would tell us of men and women, working to survive, in Hamlet, North Carolina, in Hadley, Massachusetts, in Salinas, California. To us the basic necessities and luxuries of modern life; for millions, the only way to get by.

Basement notes take you to Capitol Hill and Taco Bell

I was in the nation's capital recently (no, not really, but I have some artistic license so bear with me on this one OK?) and who did I run into but Supreme Court Nominee Judge Clarence Thomas! I was pretty hungry and a little lost so asked him directions to the nearest fine eating establishment. The conversation went something like this:

ME: "Excuse me, Mr. Thomas? Could tell me where the local Taco Bell is?"

HIM: "Taco Bell? It's down in that direction somewhere."

ME: "I'm sorry sir. I didn't get that. Could you be more specific?"

HIM: "What do you mean? I don't know what you're getting at."

ME: "All I want is how to get to Taco Bell."

HIM: "I already told you and I will stand by my answer."

ME: "But could you give me more detailed directions."

HIM: "I don't believe that's relevant to determining my future performance as a Supreme Court justice."

ME: "But Taco Bell. . . where. . . ? Forget it.

I tried asking directions from Senator Biden but all he'd do is repeat everything I said. Ted Kennedy offered me a ride but I refused (he has an annoying habit of driving through reflecting ponds).

Fine, fine. The truly beautiful thing about my columns is that if you don't like it, it'll change real soon (label that as shameless self-promotion).

Graffitti of the week this week comes to us from the esteemed and sometimes dignified office of our Student Trustee, Kevin Newnan. The following was written on the door of his dorm room by an unknown party: "Grimace is purple." But wait! There's more. The literary masterpiece doesn't end there. Below it is some counter-graffitti of equal magnitude: "So is your mother." Cool. My only other entry was "Dukakis in '92' and that's too silly.

Quick note here: for your pet rock to either die or run away, you have to be a really negligent pet owner. Low maintenance pets, the wave of the future.

School is a test for your hairstyle, says Hollywood "hairistocrat" Jose Eber. He says that the classroom is one big theater in which everyone judges everyone else's hairdo. "As a last alternative, you can always sit in the back of the class," jokes Jose. Jose says that he wants to bring out the inner beauty in everyone. He recommends simplicity and minor changes to personal style. Big words for someone that always wears a cowboy hat.

I hear that Chancellor Richard O'Brien wants the student government to come up with a constitution by the end of this year. As someone who has seen the SGA in action (or inaction) my immediate reaction was overpowering and lengthy laughter. Of course a lot of the goofballs have graduated and others have vowed not to return so maybe there's a chance they'll do it (heh).

President Bush vowed during his campaign to become the "Edu-cation President" but with all the time he's spent in Kennebunkport, Maine, I think he's more of a "Va-cation President."

Well that's it for this week. If you have a submission for Graffitti of the Week or you think I'm a bonehead, please write to: Marc Elliott, Collegian, Campus Center. I warn you that all materials will be subject to print. So remember, "It's gotta be the shoes."

Unions not to blame for fiscal problems

Peter Kasperowicz' editorial blaming UMass' labor unions on its budget woes was so ridiculous that I hardly took it seriously, but feel compelled to respond in case anyone else did.

To blame the fiscal crisis at UMass on labor unions is like blaming World War II on the Jews. Who are the victims here? Who haven't had a pay raise in over three years? Who have constantly lost members due to layoffs and other staff reductions?

Naive, young undergraduates like Mr. Kasperowicz should experience the real world before they condemn the working class and organized labor. Do they know what it's like to feed, clothe and maintain the health of a growing family when the cost of living has gone up 15 percent but your wages haven't? Or what it's like to tell your child that you no longer have a job and probably won't be able to find another?

Unions face a tough job of maintaining a resemblance of dignity for workers during these bad economic times, both here at UMass and throughout the country. How about demanding action from those officials in Boston and Washington who have turned their backs on the working class instead of blaming the workers, who already carry the toughest burden of all.

Tough task ahead for the republics

With the apparent break-up of the Soviet Union comes many new questions and concerns. These include defense, economic stability, U.N. representation and international relations, and relations among the republics themselves. These issues, as well as many others, must be dealt with before any policies concerning the republics can be made and life for the people of the republics can return to any degree of normality.

Anthony Crowley

Since last month's coup, many have become concerned about the state of the Soviet military, specifically over its nuclear weapon stockpiles. Who now controls the nuclear weapons? Is it the republics or does the Kremlin maintain central control? Mikhail Gorbechev has stated that all nuclear weapons will be moved to the Russian republic and will remain under the control of the Kremlin. However, the United States and other powers of the world must consider that, instead of one Soviet Union to deal with there are now several independent states. Although things look promising, the nations of the world must not act prematurely by cutting back too greatly on defense.

With defense concerns also lie problems of international relations and representation. The nations of the world will now have to deal with several governments concerning relief efforts for the people. Most importantly is the question of United Nations representation. The Soviet Union is one of the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, and hence has a special veto power. Even if the loose federation of independent republics is formed, there would still remain a problem of UN representation. After all, the republics would still remain independent, each with its own agenda. Would all of the republics receive veto powers? Some kind of compromise must come of this.

Economic stability and relations among the republics go hand-in-hand. In the past, the republics have relied upon each other for food, raw materials, finished goods, etc. For example, the Ukraine is the "bread basket" of the Soviet Union. Ukrainian officials have recently announced that the Ukraine will first see to the needs of its own people before sending food to any of the other republics. With the coming winter may also come starvation for many people of the other smaller, poorer republics. Whether through a loose federation of republics or not, the governments of these newly free states must come to some agreement to assist each other, through trade agreements and other means, in order that the people can survive.

While the republics have succeeded in gaining their independence from the strong grip of the Communist party, much work lies ahead for the new governments, the governments of other nations, the UN and the people of the republics. Many obstacles must be overcome before life can continue with a degree of normalcy. The hard work has just begun.

The Doctor is a feel-good movie that feels like a winner

By JON LUPO
Collegian Correspondent

There is a trend these days in Hollywood. It is the age of retribution, the age of feel-good movies. From Arnold Schwarzenegger's nice-guy terminator to Harrison Ford in Regarding Henry to Billy Crystal in the cute, but overrated City Slickers, recent films have a decidedly nicer edge.

There's nothing wrong with feel-good movies of course. In the case of the five Rocky films and the three Karate Kid movies, the public seems to like them. In the case of The Doctor, the latest feel-good movie is also a great film.

The plot of The Doctor involves (what else!) a doctor (played by William Hurt) who ignores his wife (Christine Lahti) and son (Charlie Koismo), is cold and unfeeling to his patients, and is a genuine louse.

He then contracts throat cancer, becomes a patient and learns how bad he has been, becomes a better doctor and a better person in the process! Too nice? Not quite.

It is important to know that he wasn't an evil person before he got cancer. He was the consummate professional — very efficient, and very insensitive. He remarks to a female patient who has a large scar on the front of her body: "Hey, your husband will love it. . . you look just like a Playboy centerfold — staples and all!" He thinks it's funny.

He also says things like, "I'd rather you cut straight and care less," to a group of interns.

What follows is that the doctor gets a taste of his own medicine. He must fill out forms; wait; endure painful tests; and wait some more. He must also deal with a doctor who doesn't seem to care that much — very similar to the kind of doctor he was.

He doesn't immediately turn into Mr. Nice Guy; he still ignores his wife, spending all of his time and sharing his feelings with a terminal cancer patient (played by Elizabeth Perkins).

AP Photo

Actress Elizabeth Perkins

Brilliantly acted and stunningly directed, The Doctor is easily one of the year's ten best. Director Randa Haines (Children of a Lesser God) has assembled a stellar cast.

William Hurt is simply one of the finest actors around. His portrayal of the doctor is never one-dimensional, the viewer can see the layers of the performance. It is definitely worth an Oscar nomination, if not the award.

Speaking of Academy Awards, Elizabeth Perkins (Big) should garner one for her subtle, gentle performance of someone who is dying, but not ready to give up on life. It couples with Hurt's performance, as they both create three-dimensional characters.

There is one scene in particular where Perkins and Hurt are in the desert, contemplating life and death. In knowing she is terminal and he may die, it makes for a thoroughly moving scene.

As Hurt's wife, Christine Lahti (Running on Empty) must play second fiddle to Perkins, but every scene she's in, she subtly commands the moment.

Also fine in smaller roles are Mandy Patakin (Dick Tracey) and Adam Arkin (television's China Beach).

The only problem in The Doctor (the only one) is that the ending is typical Hollywood. You'll be able to see it coming a mile away, but since the other elements are so rich, one can dismiss it as a small flaw.

What could have been a cheesy disease-of-the-week TV-movie is a sensitive, moving film with some of the best performances of the year.

Leno hurt on motorcycle

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Jay Leno suffered cuts and bruises in a motorcycle collision over the weekend, but said he won't miss work as guest host of the "Tonight Show."

The 41-year-old comedian said he was riding along Mulholland Highway in suburban Calabasas on Saturday morning when he slowed to help a motorcyclist who was stalled on the side of the road.

He was making a turn when another motorcycle, driven by Jeffrey Flaherty, 48 of Hermosa Beach, struck his bike, said California Highway Patrol Sgt. Richard Barton.

Leno said he swerved to try to avoid Flaherty's motorcycle, but couldn't get out of the way. His left leg was cut and bruised, but his first concern was for his vintage 1951 Vincent, he said.

"The first thing I did is call a buddy with a truck to pick up the bike," Leno said Sunday. "Then you go to the hospital."

Leno was treated at Westlake Medical Center.

New Sheldon has intrigue, sex and UFO's

By JON LUPO
Collegian Correspondent

The Doomsday Conspiracy
Sidney Sheldon
Morrow

Fans of Sidney Sheldon's mega-bestseller novels (The Other Side of Midnight and If Tomorrow Comes, among others) who expect expert plotting, exciting characters, as well as healthy doses of sex intrigue, sex and suspense, won't be let down in his latest and eleventh novel, The Doomsday Conspiracy. While it has all of the aforementioned, it has what other Sheldon novels do not: a male protagonist, UFO's and an environmental theme.

Not since his first novel, The Naked Face, has Sheldon had a male as his main character. His staple bevy of beauties are noticeably absent here, as Sheldon adopts more of an adventure theme: think of it as Tom Clancy - lite.

Navy Commander Robert Bellamy is given his final assignment - to investigate the crash of a NATO weather balloon in the Swiss Alps. He must find the 10 witnesses and question them. He finds that there was no weather balloon but a UFO that crashed, complete with three aliens- two dead and one missing.

For almost half the book, Bellamy has no clue what role he plays in this international cover-up/conspiracy. This is a little hard to believe that such an expert spy has no clue that he's being used.

Sheldon expertly uses his tried and true method formula. He sets up a larger story line arc that follows throughout the whole novel. He then delves into the pasts of the characters, creating smaller storylines. Bellamy has an ex-wife he's still in love with, a beautiful, but devious prostitute who helps him, and the gorgeous female alien who encounters humans in her quest to communicate with her planet (E.T. phone home?)

The Doomsday Conspiracy contains elements from "Star Trek," "Cocoon," and even previous Sheldon novels. While the UFO plot seems silly out of context, it fits in somehow. He has a way of making the reader believe in what he's writing. And that's all a good storteller has to do. His extensive research adds authenticity, but it's also hollow. But what do we want from a guy who created The Patty Duke Show as well as I Dream of Jeannie? ... William Faulkner?

To those who have enjoyed Sidney Sheldon's other novels (including myself) this won't disappoint. One could always contemplate who'll star in the inevitable movie or miniseries (Memories of Midnight, Sheldon's most recent novel, will be on television this fall). How about Harrison Ford and Meryl Streep? No? I'm sure Richard Chamberlain and Jaclyn Smith are available. Aren't they always?

Producer Maurice Starr shoots off a new record label

BOSTON (AP) — Musical entrepreneur Maurice Starr, who started his career as a teen-ager singing with his brothers and went on to produce superstars New Kids on the Block and New Edition, unveiled his own record label Sunday.

"I wanted to build [in Boston] what Barry Gordy built with Motown in Detroit," Starr said. "That wasn't a place known for [music] either. New York was really the place back in those days. We're going to show that Boston can be a mecca for this."

Sunday's kickoff at Boston's World Trade Center came complete with screaming teen-agers straining for a glimpse of New Kids Joe McIntyre and Danny Wood. They and other celebrities were hustled through in limousines to a private concert featuring Starr's newest discovery, Rick Wess.

It was an unlikely scene in Boston, a city not generally on the entertainment celebrity circuit.

"This is the next phase," Starr said before the lavish inaugural party for his new Boston International Records. "After this, it may be movies or it might be something else."

Boston International Records is based in the city's Roxbury section, a low-income, predominantly black neighborhood. Starr said 80 percent of his talent will be drawn from the area. There are branch offices in Burbank, California and New York.

"I want to continue to take kids with dreams and songs in their hearts and show them that, with some persistence, they can make it," he said.

Wes, an 18-year-old from Fall River who has toured with New Kids on the Block, will be the first artist to appear on the Boston International label. His single "Possession" is scheduled to be released this week.

Crooner Frankie Valli also has signed on, but Starr insists his emphasis will be on new talent.

Having his own label "gives me more independence," he said. "I'm the chief. I don't have to ask somebody else which record to put out."

Starr came to Boston from his home town of Deland, Fla. in 1972 with his five brothers, who performed together as the Johnson Brothers Band. He wrote and produced for other groups during the 70s and discovered four young singers called New Edition in 1982, managing them to to the top of the black music charts.

New Edition later broke their contract with Starr, arguing that they were minors when they signed with him.

Starr went on to assemble New Kids on the Block from Boston high schools, where he found five boys who could sing like New Edition and dance like the Motown groups in their heyday. The lucrative group made millions in record sales, concert appearances and merchandising.

The Boston International label will be distributed by Hollywood Records, a division of the Disney empire, company officials said.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Do not give up on an exciting job or idea. Your communication skills give you an edge over your competition. A stroke of good luck enhances both romance and family life.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): The emphasis now is on making your personal relationships more fulfilling. Admit past mistakes. You will be surprised at what a big difference your honesty makes.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Financial success depends on your being more assertive. Speak up. Other people cannot guess what you are thinking. Managing your money is easier now.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Be diplomatic or your could lose the ground you recently gained at work or school. Seek an expert's advice before signing a contract. Cash in on an opportunity before it is too late.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You are on your way to a major triumph! Social contacts will play a key role in your success. Cooperate with older people but steer clear of risky investments. Make regular savings deposits.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A great day to pursue your personal goals. A creative project gets the green light. Financial backing will follow. Your romantic partner needs more attention.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Steer clear of people who try to draw you into risky ventures. Their castles are built on sand. Your gifts as a storyteller make you a big hit as a social function.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Dynamic action is the key to greater success. Get right to the point in business talks and you will see immediate results. An obstacle to happy romance is removed. Consolidate recent financial gains.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Someone owes you a favor—ask for it. A word from the right person helps you to climb to the top. Give serious thought to changing your lifestyle. A child needs more guidance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Something you hear today could bring large profits in the near future. Curb a tendency to leap without looking. Being too impulsive could scare off a prospective romantic partner. Calm down.

Jets could easily shoot down such nonsense.

That is, if it were true that the Jets didn't stink. Bills 23, Jets 20. Ha ha ha.

A Jets fan would come right back at me, citing statistics about how much the Jets have improved recently, how they've won a Super Bowl while my beloved Bills choked. I might rebuke that statement, noting the Bills have beaten the Jets eight straight times and that they won more AFL titles than the Jets did in the 1960s.

See how it works? Yes, it doesn't mean spit when you consider that sports are essentially games and unimportant in the grand scheme of things. But it's a lot of fun. Being a sporto is a diversion from our drab, wretched lives and what could be wrong with that?

Pats waive Wagner

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots have waived punter Bryan Wagner, whose 29.1 yard net average is the second worst in the AFC.

New England was expected to bring in a replacement later this week.

Wagner's punting average sank Sunday on his next to last punt. Standing in his end zone, his kick hit blocker Eugene Lockhart in the back. Pittsburgh's Ernie Mills fell on the ball for a touchdown with 3:18 left in the game.

That gave the Steelers their final 20-6 victory margin. New England coach Dick MacPherson blamed the mishap on Lockhart.

"Our decision to release Bryan Wagner had nothing to do with the botched punt," MacPherson said. "We felt that we needed to make a change in order to upgrade the position in terms of hang time and punt coverage."

Wagner's last punt traveled 50 yards, but Rod Woodson returned it 40 yards.

On 14 punts this year, Wagner averaged 39.1 yards in gross yardage.

He played the past two seasons for Cleveland and was signed in the off-season as a free agent after the Browns cut him. In training camp, he beat out 11th-round draft pick Paul Alsbury and free agent Shawn McCarthy for the punting job.

Women's tennis hosts Providence College

LILLIAN K. LEGGIO
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team is a squad with a purpose.

Today the Minutewomen square off against Providence College at Upper Boyden tennis courts (3 p.m.). With this match, they are looking to rebound from last week's loss to the University of Connecticut and to avenge last year's 6-3 loss to Providence. Accomplishing this feat, however, won't be easy. Providence (3-1) finished second in the Big East last year and they have only improved, according to UMass coach Edwin Gentzler.

Gentzler contends that Providence will give defending Big East champion Boston College a run for their money. Last season, the Lady Friars finished second with four freshmen in their lineup.

"The good thing about freshmen is that they stay and become sophmores," Gentzler said.

The coach also added that the Lady Friars' superior record and standing in the Big East wasn't making UMass concede early defeat, but rather they were working harder to meet the challenge.

"These two programs have fun against each other playing close, competitive matches," Gentzler said. "It'll be close and who knows maybe we'll win the match."

In addition to revenging last year's defeat, the Minutewomen (1-1) will try to bring their record above .500 after last week's loss to the University of Connecticut.

Going into last Thursday's match, UMass expected and was prepared to face a talented, well-coached University of Connecticut squad. The Minutewomen knew that they had to elevate their level of play to defeat the Huskies. According to Gentzler, the Minutewomen achieved a higher performance level, but in the crucial sets the Huskies went out and got the winning points. The winners added up for UConn as they beat UMass 7-2.

"The singles matches were competitive," Gentzler said. "The big difference in the matches were the big points. UConn won them and we didn't. What I think helped them win was their long preseason and their two freshmen players [Nicole and Flo Gaudet] who were much stronger than I anticipated."

The Gaudet sisters are the Huskies No. 5 and No. 6 players. In their matches, Nicole defeated Stacy Scheckner 6-3, 6-2 and Flo beat Kerri Kaminski 6-2, 6-4.

According to Gentzler, UMass' No. 4 player Kerenza Eddy played a great match, ousting Katie Fuller 6-3, 6-7, 6-2. The other UMass win came in doubles play as Shuzuko Yamasaki and Kerri Kaminski defeated Krista Irmischer and Darsy Cocozza.

In singles play, UMass' No. 1 player Shizuko Yamasaki took defending Division 1 Singles Champion, Ellen Barrett, to three sets before falling 3-6, 6-1, 6-4. In a match-up of No. 2's, UConn's Ashley Vilinksi beat Gail Girasella 6-3, 6-0. In a marathon match, UMass' No. 3 Amy Ryan was narrowly defeated by Cary Robinson 5-7, 6-4, 6-3.

"Amy Ryan played a gutsy three and a half hour singles match where she was hyperventillating and dehydrating," Gentzler said. "When she lost, it was like she left her heart on the court."

In other matches, Margaret Mars beat Sarah Nadolny 6-4, 6-2 and Angie Capone defeated Kelly Grim 5-7, 6-4, 6-4. Former UMass recruit, Bethann Barry beat Pam Levine 7-5, 4-2. In doubles, Gail Girasella and Kerri Kaminski lost to Ellen Barrett and Ashley Vilinski 6-4, 6-2 and Katie Fuller and Nicole Gaudet defeated Stacy Scheckner and Pam Levine.

"UConn is a very well-coached team," Gentzler said. "Just as expected, they were close and competitive matches, but they are still a little bit ahead of us."

UConn coach Pat Babcock added that the matches were very close and some could have gone either way.

"UMass came mentally and physically prepared to play, but fortunately for us the balls were bouncing our way," said Babcock.

Men's tennis beats UNH, evens record

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team evened its record at 1-1 Friday, when it defeated the University of New Hampshire Wildcats, 5-4. The teams split six singles matches and UMass captured two of the three doubles matches, with the first doubles match deciding the overall match.

UMass' Lloyd Teitelbaum played first singles, despite a hamstring injury that hurt him in his loss to UNH's Mike Damiani, 2-6, 6-3, 3-6. Teitelbaum fell to 1-1 on the year.

Minuteman Tim Lipsky won the second singles match in straight sets, 6-3, 6-2, over Marc Bessette. Lipsky improved his own record to 2-0, and has not lost a set this season.

UMass took the third singles match as well, as Paul Audet topped Mike Costello, 6-1, 7-6 (7-5). Audet also improved his personal record to 2-0.

In the fourth singles match, UNH found a winner in Peter King, who defeated Len Levine, 6-2, 1-6, 6-4. Levine has yet to win a match this season.

Keith Murray won the fifth singles match for UMass by beating Pete Kaufman in straight sets, 6-3, 6-3. Murray's record improved to 2-0, and he too has yet to lose a set this season.

In the sixth singles match, UMass' Steve Davis fell to Wildcat Matt Reun, 6-2, 3-6, 6-3. Davis' record fell to 0-2, but he is playing in his first varsity season, and he has taken both his matches to a third set.

The Minutemen and Wildcats entered doubles competition tied 3-3. Lipsky and Murray played second doubles, and lost to Costello and King, 5-7, 6-0, 3-6.

Levine and David Kleinman were once again the third doubles tandem and they completed a strong straight set victory over Bessette and Reun, 6-1, 6-1. "[They] played solid doubles," said UMass coach David Rivera, "they got a lead and completely rolled." The count stood at 4-4 following eight matches. And what of the first doubles match, which pitted Teitelbaum and Audet against Wildcats Damiani and D.J. Record (yes, that's his real name)?

This match went to UMass, and it gave the Minutemen their first victory of 1991. But it took until almost dark before the newly paired Teitelbaum and Audet wrapped up a 7-5, 4-6, 6-4 win.

Trials and tribulations of a sporto

Are you the kind of person who skips over the first section of the newspaper and turns directly to the sports section?

Can you name the league champions of each major sport for the past 10 years?

Are your Sunday afternoons incomplete without watching the post-game highlight shows on NBC, CBS, ESPN, CNN and NBC's late-night production, the George Michael Sports Machine?

In important conversations with friends, do you say things like "Hey, that's great that you're getting married, but did the Red Sox win today?"

If you can answer "yes" to any of these questions, read on. You're one of a rare breed — a "sporto."

A sporto is easily spotted by the clothes he or she wears. T-shirts with team logos, hats, jackets, keychains, sweats, neckties, shorts, boxers — the list goes on.

Greg Sukiennik

Sportos are more inclined to pledge their undying allegiance to one team than everyday fans. While Joe and Judy Average managed to make the jump from the Steelers to the Raiders to the Redskins to the Forty-Niners, depending on which team won the Super Bowl that particular year, the dedicated sporto sticks to his or her team, rain or shine.

A friend of mine has been a Detriot Lions fan since he was born, seemingly. The Lions haven't won a title since 1957, when the late Hall-of-Famer Bobby Layne was their quarterback, but he refuses to cave in. Life will be that much sweeter for him when the silver and blue eventually return to the winner's circle. The average fan, however, will never know the joy of seeing his or her favorite team finally make it after years of frustration.

That's why fans of long-suffering franchises like the Boston Red Sox or the Chicago Cubs hang on to their dreams of winning the World Series. The world may stop spinning if either team wins, but the global catastrophe that would ensue would be a small price to pay for Sox fans like me to say "We're number one!"

Sportos are also masters of meaningless sports trivia. Few average fans would remember that the Lions won the NFL title in 1957. Few would care. Even I had to look that one up in an almanac. But for the sporto, these facts hold the same value as biblical quotations hold for television evangelists.

Run-of-the-mill fans might not really give two hoots that the Kansas City Chiefs ever won a Super Bowl. After all, that was years ago, right? Well, for Chiefs fans 1970 might as well be yesterday, and you'd better not forget it. Would a New York Yankees or Montreal Canadiens or Boston Celtics booster forget that their respective franchise is considered among the most dominant in history? What do you think?

Which leads nicely into the second reason why sportos are such massive trivia fiends: to settle arguments. The First Amendment guarantees even the most misinformed moron the right to make blanket statements like "The New York Jets stink," but a well-read sporto with some interest in the fortunes of the

UMass men's x-country loses opener

Harriers fall to UMass-Lowell and Boston College

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team opened its 1991 season on a down note Friday afternoon, falling to both the University of Massachusetts-Lowell and Boston College.

UMass-Lowell won the meet with 29 points, barely ahead of BC, who scored 32. The Minutemen totaled 69 points.

UMass-Lowell secured the win by taking three of the top four spots in the race. They were led by John Doherty, who won the five mile race in a time of 25 minutes, 53 seconds.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien had expected that a lack of dominant front-runners would be the major weakness of his young team. His thoughts were confirmed as UMass could place only one runner among the top 10 finishers. Junior Matt Simon placed ninth overall in a time of 26:17.

"I was a little disappointed with the aspect of the team that I thought was our weakness, that is a lack of someone, or several people who can run with the leaders up front," O'Brien said. "To that extent, I think Matt Simon ran very well, but it still shows us that we need at least two more people who are capable of taking that front-running stance."

Other runners among the top five for UMass were Craig Cormier, who finished 14th in 26:54, Pat Reed (15th, 27:04), Mike Davis (17th, 27:18) and Keith Willis (18th, 27:18).

O'Brien said he was especially pleased with the way that Reed and Willis ran.

"I think Pat Reed and Keith Willis were the pleasant surprises of the meet," he said. "They ran very well for their season opener. Those two guys are in a lot better shape than they were at this time last year.

"Again, it's only the first meet of the year, I'm sure we'll improve as the season goes on."

The Minutemen hope to show some of that improvement on Saturday, when they compete against Iona, Northeastern and Brown.

US sets conditions on Israeli housing

Associated Press

CAIRO — Secretary of State James A. Baker III told Israeli Prime Minister Yitzak Shamir Tuesday the Bush administration will support the housing-loan guarantees Israel is vigorously seeking — if Israel accepts a four-month delay and limits on where the money can be spent.

Baker's proposal was part of an effort to end an acrimonious squabble that has upset U.S.-Israeli relations and threatened efforts to convene a Middle East peace conference next month.

Shamir said after the talks, "We have achieved a certain progress," but he added that the question of the $10 billion in loan guarantees was "not yet resolved."

Baker, rejecting a main Shamir demand, said the United States would insist on a condition that none of the money be used for settlements in the disputed territories of the West Bank and Gaza.

A senior administration official traveling on Baker's plane said the secretary of state believes that if that condition is dropped Arab countries "won't come to the table" for the talks Baker has been struggling to arrange. "That just is something we are not going to agree to," said the official.

After his meeting with Shamir, Baker flew to Egypt to confer with President Hosni Mubarak. Before he returns to Washington, Baker also plans to visit Syria and Jordan.

The furor over the loan guarantees has reverberated both domestically and internationally and has prompted unusually harsh exchanges between Bush and Israeli government officials.

At a news conference last week, Bush called his request for a 120-day delay a "pause for peace" in the Middle East and threatened to veto legislation that would approve the guarantees immediately.

U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III, left, chats with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo, the Egyptian capital on Tuesday. Baker proposed a six-point plan for $10 billion in housing loans to Israel.

Asked if he were willing to commit himself to supporting the loan guarantees in January, the president replied: "Absolutely not."

En route to Cairo from Israel, Baker outlined the main points in the U.S. offer.

"We would agree that we would not ask for further delay beyond January," he said. The U.S. proposal also includes a promise to work with supporters of the loan guarantees to find "a suitable legislative vehicle" for obtaining swift congressional approval.

The administration would restate its commitment to the principle of providing Israel aid for settling Soviet immigrants and would work to minimize the impact of the guarantees on the U.S. budget.

Finally, the package would commit the United States to solicit housing aid from other countries and would protect Israel from out-of-pocket costs resulting from the 120-day delay.

However, according to the senior official who spoke only on condition of anonymity, Shamir was holding out for the U.S. to drop its insistence that none of the money be used to build new settlements in the occupied territories, a policy the U.S. strongly opposes.

Recycling at UMass off to a slow start

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' new comprehensive recycling program has gotten off to a sluggish start, according to the University's solid waste manager.

Almost three-fourths of last weeks recyclables collected in the red and blue collection containers had to be landfilled because students were not sorting their trash correctly, said R. Marc Fournier.

see related story on page 3

This year, the University is diverting not only newsprint to the recycling effort but also mixed paper and containers.

Housing Services has invested $53,000 on the various collection containers, including the blue recycling bins now found in every room in all the residence halls. Fournier called this a "substantial commitment."

Fournier urged the campus community to make an

Science majors are a rare species

UMass professor brings back ideas from conference

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Correspondent

Science majors are becoming a rare species in the United States, and the lack of interest is being blamed on the schools' teaching methods.

Only an estimated 5 to 8 percent of high school graduates enter college as science majors, according to the National Science Foundation, and a startling 80 percent of those change majors after their first science course.

A landmark conference was held by the department of Health and Human Services this summer in Columbus, Ohio to address this crisis. University of Massachusetts Public Health Professor Linda Nolan attended this historic meeting.

The national conference, "Prologue to Action: Life Sciences Education and Science Literacy," held in June, was initiated by HHS Secretary Louis W. Sullivan under President Bush's directive as part of a campaign to improve national science literacy.

According to the NSF, U.S. high school seniors placed last in recent international achievement tests.

"The nation is in a serious crisis," Nolan said. "We have to inspire our youth into interest. To do this, we have to communicate the excitement of science. We have to get real scientists into the classroom, and allow the teachers into the laboratories so they can convey that excitement first hand."

The conference dealt with specific areas such as teacher education, curriculum development, student incentives, and public awareness. Nolan, who teaches the Public Health course "My Body, My Health" here at the University, sat on the curriculum development committee.

"The curriculum committee felt that students were naturally interested in their own bodies, and would more readily remember basic scientific principles when the human body was used as a model," Nolan said.

School of Public Health Dean, Professor Stephen Gehlbach, felt that Nolan's invitation to attend the conference is both an honor for her and for the University. Many influential government figures, including National Institutes of Health Director Bernadine Healy, the secretary of education, and officials from the National Science Foundation were present.

"The conference demonstrated how seriously Washington is taking the science education crisis," said Gehlbach. "More definitely needs to be done at the federal level."

Gehlbach said he does not know what specific action can be taken locally, but opportunities abound.

"At this point it is too early to cite definite plans, but there are many possibilities to explore," he said. "We should open up discussion on campus, get the University more involved. Even students could go into local classrooms. It could be very exciting."

Mary Alice Wilson, Coordinator of the Five College/Public School Partnership, said that summer research fellowships have been offered for high school teachers who have never had the chance to do research.

"Financial problems make it harder, but also that much

Dagarin banks on 'values' in bid

By JASON GEORGE

Douglas Dagarin, Republican candidate for State Senate.

Although Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin is running against Stan Rosenberg in the race to fill John Olver's seat in the Massachusetts State Senate, he says he doesn't consider himself a politician.

"It's not my desire to be a politician," Dagarin said. "It's not my desire to discover where the interests of the majority lie and start talking accordingly.

"It's my desire to be a statesman — I have a set of values that I'm trying to be very transparent about," Dagarin said. "People who support me will do so because of their support for family values."

Dagarin is competing with State Representative Stan Rosenberg of Amherst in a special election on Sept. 24 to fill the seat vacated by John Olver, who was elected to the US House of Representatives on June 4.

The cornerstone of Dagarin's campaign lies on a credo of what he calls "more self-government both on a personal and local governmental level."

Included among Dagarin's positions are a commitment to encouraging individual economic enterprise, a strong anti-abortion stance, and a "desire not to see our government justify homosexual behavior."

"I'm opposed to abortion — it suggests that there is something more important than the family," Dagarin said. "The basic thrust of my belief about abortion is in my belief about my creator. God makes children, not men."

Dagarin's other run for public office came against Olver in the general election of 1990 for State Senate. Dagarin said he believed the race reinforced to him that there was a receptive public for his message.

"I was encouraged that I took 35 percent of the vote against a 21-year incumbent," Dagarin said. "It communicated to me that there was a significant interest in change."

Dagarin added that between the last election and this one, he "decided to put more emphasis on moral issues.

"Until we get back to teaching right from wrong, loyalty, honesty, and hard work, until these values are instilled in our children, we can't expect tomorrow's businessmen and politicians to be more scrupulous than they are today," Dagarin said. "Until we solve our moral recession, we won't solve our economic recession."

Despite the fact that Rosenberg has a reputation as an advocate of higher education, Dagarin said he believes his plans regarding education are more far-sighted than those of his opponent. "My vision for higher education is more than the idea of simply increasing the budget," Dagarin said. "The state would do well to stimulate more cooperation between industry and higher education . . . [the state] should use the vast resources of the University to do research and design for industry."

Dagarin also suggested that more emphasis should be placed on earlier job training for young adults and for capable students to be moved more quickly into a university setting to develop "more of a cohesive transition" for young adults.

Dagarin has lived in Williamsburg for the past 12 years with his wife and five children. After graduating from Florida State University in 1972, he received his law degree at the University of Denver in 1975.

more important," Wilson said. "However, we do have a wonderful resource that shouldn't be overlooked: the college students. Local students of all grade levels would benefit immensely from an afternoon talking with them."

"Within a year, there will be programs across the nation for both teachers and students," Nolan said. "They will go into government labs and universities, and learn how scientists conduct research and work. They'll cease to be holed away from view, mysterious to the students, inaccessible. It's a revolution, really."

Five College panel discusses Soviet affairs

By JOE O'CONNOR
Collegian Staff

The future of Russia, the factors that led up to the attempted coup of President Mikhail Gorbachev and what role the United States should play in all this were the topics discussed at a Five College Panel Monday night at Amherst College.

The panel was run by Professor Allan Crass, a political science teacher at Hampshire College; Professor Vincent Ferraro, the Chairman of the International Relations board at Mount Holyoke College; Professor William Taubman, an instructor on Soviet Politics at Amherst College; and Professor Vladislav Zuboc, also an Soviet Politics instructor at Amherst and a Russian native.

Taubman began by relating the things which led up to the coup. According to Taubman, these could be lumped into three revolutions — political, economic, and imperial — which have all been going on in Russia for the past few years.

Taubman stressed that all this was opposed by the political right, which includes the KGB, the military leaders and the nationalists. In order to appease them, Taubman said, "...Gorbachev only went halfway in his reforms, and furthermore went slowly [so as to] keep things together."

Taubman said that in the end the coup failed because the leaders feared the consequences of failure, and also feared shedding too much blood. But, Taubman warned that "the coup changed everything and nothing...that the revolutions are still in progress, and if they aren't completed...another coup might be attempted."

Zubok then tackled the subject of Russia's present and future. "The deciding factors in Russia's future," he said, "are who will lead, and how will domestic policy develop."

Zubok mainly discussed Boris Yeltsin, head of the Supreme Soviet. Although Yeltsin has been unfavorably compared to Gorbachev by some, Zubok said, "Yeltsin is much closer to Russian blood, to Russian nature, than Gorbachev."

He added that Yeltsin's representation could be the most pro-Western setup the Soviet Union has seen since 1914. In closing, Zubok said that Yeltsin would do what is necessary to hold Russia together, citing the fact that Yeltsin had sent emissaries to the republics to keep good relations.

Crass and Ferraro discussed the U.S.'s role, especially regarding arms control. Crass pointed out that previous treaties signed with Russia assumed that a strong government would be there to uphold them.

"That's not there now," said Crass, and warned that a lack of a definite chain of command could be inhibiting.

Crass also said that American foreign and military policy has justified nuclear weapons because of the "Eastern threat." With that gone, "we have to start considering unilateral disarmament."

Students' pets forgotten

Animals abandoned over semester break

By MICHAEL LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

College life is seen as a rite of passage, a bridge between adolescence and adulthood. As they learn to survive on their own, most college students leave behind the security blanket provided by Mom and Dad and strike out down the road to independence.

Not all are successful, however. Many students find the adjustment difficult. They discover an aching need for companionship, and they fill their void by buying a pet.

The problem is that many of these pets are left to fend for themselves when semester break arrives and students return home. While students are either tearing open their Christmas gifts or taking a leisurely dip in the pool, many of their pets are wandering the streets.

"You'll pick up some around Christmas time when [students] go home, and you'll pick up some in the spring when school closes; that's when it looks the worst," said Bob Adair of the Amherst Pound. "I won't blame it all on students. I think a lot of it is them, but not all of it."

While abandonment may be an area-wide problem, a university official says on-campus students are rarely to blame — primarily because of housing rules restricting most pets.

"Students can have no pets except fish in a ten-gallon tank or smaller," said Larry Moneta, associate director of Housing Services.

Yet, such policies don't completely prevent students from housing pets in the dorms. Nor does it stop them from abandoning the animals later. Though Moneta says the "20 or 30 times a year" abandoned animals are found on campus is very small, there are still kittens, snakes, hamsters and gerbils left behind.

"We've rarely had a violation with a dog, since they're too loud," he said. "Most people are responsible [about regulations]."

While the UMass campus doesn't allow pets, though, another area college does. Through the work of two on-campus groups, the Community Council and the Pet Co-op, Hampshire College permits students to register their favorite animals.

"We had a lobster registered last year," said Jay Maroney, chairman of the Community Council. "You're supposed to register your pet with Pet Co-op — a subcommittee of Public Health and Safety — and they regulate pets on campus."

Yet, while this system — which Maroney says students are "overwhelmingly in favor of" — might appear to be the proper solution to the problem of pet abandonment, it has its problems.

"At the end of the year, there are pets left in the dorm rooms — mostly hamsters and gerbils; I don't know about dogs, necessarily, but I have heard about stray cats," said Maroney, who himself has a two and a half year old boxer named Gilda on campus.

"It's not a problem during the school year, but it happens mostly at the end."

Students who live off-campus in the Amherst area also certainly contribute to the abandonment problem, but some apartment complex officials don't believe the lion's share of the blame lies with their residents.

"We have never had [an abandonment] here," said an official at Mill Valley Apartments who declined to give her name. "We do allow pets. We allow cats, birds, fish and small animals. . . A very small percentage of residents actually keep pets but they seem well taken care of."

The manager of Townehouse Apartments agreed that while pets are allowed there, the problem of abandonment is not widespread.

"Occasionally, we'll find a stray cat, and one of the other tenants will take it in," said the woman, who asked not to be identified. "The student population is much more likely to abandon animals than families, but in most cases even the students have been very good.

"The people that operate and live here are concerned enough to deal with such an issue if it arose," she said. "An animal would not be just out there to starve to death. But it really has never been an issue."

Regardless of who is to blame, the pet abandonment problem is a very real issue to be dealt with — something Bob Adair knows only too well.

"If an animal is picked up, they have to stay in the pound for an automatic 10 days, then they're put up for adoption," said the pound director. "But it's getting harder and harder to place a good animal."

How to use blue bins

Students finding many creative uses

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

It may not be on "Late Night with David Letterman" yet, but the Top Ten Alternative Uses for your Blue Recycling Bin have been appearing in the University residence halls.

With the advent of an extensive campus-wide recycling program this year, each residence hall room came equipped with a blue recycling bin for the collection of all recyclables — mixed containers and papers.

But many students have been using the recycling bin in alternative ways.

Jen Hall and Sharon Wang, who live in Orchard Hill, are housing their baby hamster, Francis, in the recycling box. The hamster still lives in a regular cage but this cage has been placed in the box for extra protection.

"The plastic (of the box) is too slick" for the hamster to escape, Hall said.

The roomates are still recycling, but have opted not to use the special box.

Scott Newman and Mike Tow, also from Orchard Hill, have decided to utilize the recycling box as a table. Situated between two futons, Newman said the recycling box matches the blue color of the futons, takes the place of a sturdy table, and "looks good."

"It's much nicer than a crate," Tow said. The roomates have decided to only recycle cans and bottles and use the recycling bin as a table, complete with lamp on top.

Newman said, "I'm not a big recycling fan. It's easier to throw (trash) in a barrel."

Heather Witaliaz, who lives in Southwest, uses her recycling bin to carry her laundry. Witaliaz has seen the bins used as a miniature basketball hoop for "recreational use." The only trash she recycles are cans.

Kara Foley and Kelly Monahan also live in Southwest. "Right now, we're using it for our stereo-turntable," Foley said.

Nevertheless, some students have opted to recycle.

Debbie Speicher, who lives in Orchard Hill, initially feared sorting her recyclable trash in the red and blue collection containers. But once she began the brief sorting process, she discovered that "it's not really a hardship."

halls. Fournier called this a "substantial commitment."

Fournier urged the campus community to make an effort to recycle their waste by familiarizing themselves with the informational recycling brochures given to all students at the start of the academic year.

"We need them [both students and faculty] to recycle comprehensively. The town is watching us extremely closely," he said.

"It is really important. If we don't do a major amount of recycling now, the town will fine us" for landfilling recyclable waste, Fournier said. At this time, the University is not being fined by the town of Amherst, but if the levels of recyclables collected does not increase in the following weeks, fines may begin.

Fournier said the money to pay the town fines would be extracted from the recycling budget, subsequently raising housing costs.

Sherill Baldwin, the program coordinator for the Housing Services' Residential Recycling Program, attributed last week's slow start to the normal confusion of moving in to the residence halls.

"I'm hoping for a pretty good turnaround from what (the collection rates) were last week," Baldwin said.

The University landfills over 5,000 tons of waste each year, equivalent to 12 PVTA buses filled with garbage every week, a Residential Recycling Program brochure said. Fournier said more than half of this waste is recyclable.

University trash that can't be recycled is brought to the Amherst landfill.

Melinda McCall, the solid waste coordinator for the Department of Public Works in Amherst, optimistically projects that the Amherst landfill will be totally full in 10 years. But, McCall cautioned, that estimate is only relevant if the UMass recycling program starts showing some positive results.

McCall said 25 percent of the waste brought to the Amherst landfill comes from the University. "Their [UMass] participation is essential," McCall said.

The Residential Recycling Program figures the University spent last year almost $400,000 on disposing trash in the Amherst landfill. Last year, the University paid $65 per ton to dump the trash. If the new recycling program does not begin to collect the minimum level of recyclables, the University will pay $118 per ton.

Fournier said comprehensive recycling is a new process for many students but they should try to be "a little less apathetic" about recycling.

"I have faith in the student body," Fournier said. "You as a person can make a direct impact on the environment by recycling. If we care about the kind of environment our kids will grow up in, we must recycle now."

Editorial/Opinion

Empty promises: true confessions of a music club victim

Some time ago, in a moment of reckless abandon, I did something I am not particularly proud of. I joined a compact disk club.

For the benefit of those readers who are naturally wary of such clubs, and therefore probably consider me to be a complete moron, let me just say that this wasn't one of those sleazy fly-by-night compact disk clubs that suck you in with empty promises in some miniature, crudely fashioned newspaper, rob you blind and leave you for dead. This compact disk club had full color ads in major magazines. Four compact disks at astounding breakthrough prices!" heralded one ad. "What would you expect to pay for such a collection? Two hundred dollars? Three hundred dollars?"

The actual price turned out to be one dollar, which, I later discovered, is also the average price per square nanometer of the one regular club "selection" I was required to buy with the deal.

At the time, though, the convincing nature of the sales pitch, compounded with the fact that I have the IQ of bark, made me actually smile, with smug self-assurance, as I checked the little box ("Yes! I can see this swindle coming a mile away!"), and mailed my soul to Indiana.

The bills began arriving immediately.

Let me just explain that my compact disk club operates on what I like to call a "hassle-free" basis, by which I mean that I am spared the hassle of actually ordering my own selections, or even receiving them. This is just as well, given the three basic categories the selections fall into:

A. Heavy metal bands with names like "Cerebral Danish" that no one on earth has ever heard of.

B. "Beautiful Listening" anthologies, originally recorded on the Edison Gramophone.

C. Buffalo Springfield's Greatest Hits.

Shawn McDonnell

Under the hassle-free system, I am never subjected to selections such as these, since the only portion of any package which actually reaches me is the bill.

"Have you forgotten?" the bill will query, in it's zany, rhetorical way. "You have not yet sent us large amounts of money for no readily apparent reason."

Generally I pay these bills, because I am afraid that if I don't pay, the club might actually send me one of the selections, thus making me feel obligated to play it. My motto is "Fifty dollars a week is a small price to pay to avoid 'Cerebral Danish.'"

Another thing worth avoiding is complaining, which is what I tried to do after noticing that although the club ads feature stylish shots of Billy Joel and John Lennon, they do not actually, technically feature selections by either artist.

I called the consumer phone line to get to the bottom of this matter but wound up, of, course, with their talking computer — which has a never-ending menu of selections ("If your mother's maiden name has an i-e construction, press '2' on your touchtone phone") designed to make it humanly impossible for you to ever actually reach the fabled "sales representatives." This is just as well, since they'd probably only put you on hold anyway.

This is effectively what they did a few months back, when I took it upon myself to write the club a brief letter, asking the kind of hard-hitting questions which has made me feared and admired in journalist circles.

"How can I actually get any decent music from your club," I asked, "short of listening to the radio link-up when you put me on hold?" The response card I got, several weeks later, told me that my inquiry could not be immediately processed. I had been put on hold via mail.

There was a bill with the card.

The moral of today's story is that everyone on the face of the earth has deceitful ulterior motives and is out to take advantage of you. I suggest the only reasonable course of action is for all of you to lock yourselves in meditative chambers and find your inner light, before God destroys the entire dishonest planet.

And if you'll agree to buy one meditative chamber at regular club prices, I'll give you four more for a dollar.

Uptown designated driver program becomes reality

For those of you obsessed with keeping up to date on the latest trends, you might be interested to know that the hottest fashion accessory to hit the college scene has just arrived.

This new addition to any wardrobe cannot be found in Bloomingdales, Macy's or The Gap, but right here in Amherst, our very own hot spot for making waves.

Entering an uptown bar this past weekend with a group of friends, the bouncer not only asked to see our IDs, but also wanted to know which one of us was the "Designated Driver."

Felice Cohen

Having settled this before we came, I stepped forward. As my friends watched in awe, he proceeded to snap a bracelet (resembling the ones you get in hospitals), around my wrist.

Clueless, I stood there until he explained to me the purpose of this dangling yellow and black band. I learned that by wearing this band it entitled me to free sodas all evening and the option of purchasing Sharps, a non-alcoholic beer, for only a buck.

Then he told me not to remove it until I left. I thought this was pretty funny since one, I didn't have a pair of scissors in my purse and two, why would I want to discard something that was going to provide me with free drinks?

Upon further inspection, I noticed on the bracelet a slogan which read, Miller "Think When You Drink". Suddenly everything became clear.

Glancing around the bar I noticed others wearing the same chic fashion statement. Making eye contact, we nodded appreciatively at one another, confident with our decisions and satisfied with our free drinks.

Not only did this entitle me to free sodas all evening, but it also gave me something to save as a momento. And I'm not taking about the plastic thing hanging from my wrist either.

I mean my life.

Being able to drive myself and my friends home safely after a night uptown is worth more than adjoining my car to the side of an oak tree.

Being the inquisitive kind, I asked the bar manager how this whole idea began. She explained that starting this past weekend, two local establishments are going to be handing out Designated Driver bracelets, which are sponsored by Miller Brewing Company.

These bracelets not only make students more aware of drinking and driving, but they do so in a way that make them feel it is worth sacrificing a night of drinking. By offering incentives, like free soda all evening, I know many people who would chose to drive.

I was also told that the two bars, the first in the area to do this, are looking at making more of a variety for the future, like virgin coladas and daiquiris.

Returning home that evening, flashing my shiny new bracelet in front of her eyes, I told my roommate all about my experience. For a moment, a very brief moment, we got lost in thought.

"Would going uptown become a sober experience?"

No, we decided, it wouldn't go that far (this is UMass, of course), but for a brief moment the thought did flash across our minds. As it must have also entered that of the bar we went to, for it has some other ideas in mind.

On Wednesday nights they are going to be holding non-alcoholic dance parties for underage students. "We want to try to promote dancing and fun, rather than booze and drinking," said the manager.

When a bar stops promoting alcohol and starts giving out free sodas, I think it may be time for all of us to start asking some questions.

Like, for instance, how much money are our parents paying them?

UMass graduate's friends tell of sadness upon his recent death

Editor's note: Saturday, Sept. 14, a 1991 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, John Havey, died in a car accident. The following letter comes from his friends.

I lost a friend this weekend. He's gone. No matter how hard I wish to wake up and find out it was all a bad dream, I now realize that it's not going to happen. As I think about our last conversation together, I begin to cry. I haven't cried since I was a child, but now it seems so appropriate. Remembering all the good times is what brings on the tears. I never got to tell him how much he meant to me, but who would have known.

I always looked up to him. Whenever there was a problem I could look to him for a solution. Whenever I messed up, and needed some guidance, he was there to show me the way. I know I never said it out loud, but I couldn't have done it without you, John, and I will never forget you.

I know that when someone dies there are always people that boast about how good and noble the person was. But I don't need to boast. John was himself. Sometimes harsh, sometimes cranky, but always a friend.

Politics spoil nomination

In grade school we learned about our federal government—the the three branches and their roles. The legislative branch makes the laws, the executive executes them, and the judicial branch interprets the laws made by Congress. These facts are as elementary and ingrained in our heads as our multiplication tables.

Bob Freeman

Yet, we have watched and are watching the perversion of these most basic principles. We are witnessing and even encouraging the trespassing of the legislature's sole domain of policy-making by the Supreme Court. The warning flags are yet to be raised, and we seem, today, destined to one day awaken in unfamiliar territory, where our founding fathers lived and tried to teach us never to enter.

Today, our legislators are grilling Clarence Thomas. They are probing this man's mind to decide whether or not he is the one to fill the vacancy left by Thorogood Marshall. In some circles, people say that a nomination ought to be rejected on grounds of politics. Regardless, the Senate Judiciary Committee is not investigating what and where they should. Many of the questions are wrong and unnecessary, and unfortunately, Mr. Thomas' stances will seal (or already have sealed) his fate.

For example, if enough Senators do not not approve of his positions on abortion or affirmative action, we will see him go the way of Robert Bork. What door he walks through once his interrogation is over will be decided solely on his political views, not his Constitutional philosophy.

Those in the legislative branch are elected by us, the people, to make laws that will be perceived to be just and fair in our eyes. If they fail to, we have the ability to petition our legislators to repeal it. If they fail to, we hold the power to replace them with someone who is more sympathetic to their constituents.

But, the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and whatever laws the legislative branch enacts must be in accordance with the guidelines erected within it. When a questionable law is passed and is brought before the Supreme Court, it is the Court's role only to decide whether it follows the Constitution, not if it is just, fair, or morally correct.

George Bush nominated Clarence Thomas to be a Supreme Court justice, one who interprets laws on Constitutional grounds. We are not electing Mr. Thomas to decide what laws are good ones. It is up to the people to decide on such, not the nine justices who sit on the Supreme Court. Their job is to rule on the Constitutionality of a law. They are the experts on the Constitution, and we the experts on what laws should be made for our benefit. Once we allow them to decide on the fairness, morality or appropriateness of a law, we then voluntarily relinquish all our power and say in our own affairs.

This nomination is a watershed one. The people and Congress seem to care less about how Clarence Thomas views the Constitution than if his views are agreeable.

New album by Fugazi is a little bit of a repeater

By TODD BOURRET
Collegian Correspondent

Fugazi is at a tricky point in their career. They've set some pretty high standards for themselves with their first two E.P.'s, Fugazi and Margin Walker. Both were near brilliant recordings that managed to take the energy and anger of hardcore and sharpen it to a more melodic, more sophisticated point. 1990's Repeater L.P. only served to reinforce the fact that Fugazi is a band which must be heard.

Their impact now on the hardcore scene is easily recognized. Dozens of Fugazi sound-alikes have sprung up all over, and Fugazi record sales have been astonishing, considering their record label (run by singer/guitarist Ian MacKay) has relatively low distribution.

Fugazi

Just as astonishing is Fugazi's refusal to sell out. The band has recently turned down several offers from big corporate record companies. Most of the money from live shows goes to benefit small, non-profit organizations.

Do you see the situation they've put themselves in? It would take a pretty amazing record to improve upon what Fugazi has already accomplished.

Well, with their new L.P. Steady Diet of Nothing, Fugazi lives up to expectations, but does not really exceed them. Nothing comes as much of a surprise on this album.

Don't get me wrong — this is a great record. All the elements are there: catchy melodies, complex rhythm changes, quick stops and starts, searing lyrics, big guitars, etc. It just seems that most of these songs could be tagged on to Repeater. Oh, well. You can't have everything.

The best tracks? "Reclamation", in which Ian demands control of his body over droning guitars and a skankin' reggae bassline; "Nice New Outfit", a biting jab at military higher-ups ("You're number one with a bullet/that's money well spent/your mouth plastered like a poster/ address yourself success/You can pinpoint a chimney and drop one down its length/in your nice new outfit/sorry about the mess,") and "Polish", which has the same ability to sway heads as "Waiting Room" and "Shut the Door" did on earlier albums.

I suggest you go out, get Steady Diet of Nothing, and judge for yourself. I just hope that in the future, Fugazi will still be able to crank out more fresh sounding, innovative material.

Other Stuff:

Faith No More's Mike Patton is back on the rampage, this time with the Experimental/Funk/Sick Joke band Mr. Bungle. Produced by avant-jazz-punk god-head John Zorn, this record sounds a bit like Naked City — if they were a Red Hot Chili Peppers cover band. Interesting (and random) stuff, indeed.

If you haven't heard of the band Clockhammer, then you should start taking notice. Their self-entitled debut album on First Warning Records has been on my stereo constantly. They somehow manage to meld mellow, garagey, jazzy stuff with some heavy grooves that would make Prong jealous. Definitely worth catching.

Stay tuned. Next week I'll be bringing you up-to-date on some new releases from Mute Records. Hasta la vista, baby.

history.

I could watch Michael Jordan play basketball from now until Massachusetts reinstates Happy Hour, but is he really worth the millions of dollars he receives each year? Is anyone worth that kind of money? Maybe a surgeon who performs life saving operations is deserves that type of cash, but being able to hit a 15 foot jumper, no matter how exciting, isn't so worthy.

Perhaps I'm a hypocrite, because in a small way I'm paying the salaries of these mega-stars everytime I enter Fenway, the Gahhden or Foxboro Stadium (no, that's not a misprint).

Therein lies part of the problem. We're so engrossed with our local sports teams that when the opportunity arises to actually be in the stadium when Tom Brunansky makes the final diving catch to clinch the division, or to see Larry Bird bounce his head off the parquet on route to dismantling the Pacers, we can't reject the offer.

My newfound (found while deciding over bagels or English muffins) theory is that sports is society's biggest and most addictive drug. A day without the Sox box score, US Open results or the latest on Bo Jackson, is a day without, well, without sports.

Maybe bubble gum does depreciate the value of baseball cards, and maybe it's even worse for the teeth, but the fact that the power of money has forced the removal of gum from packs of cards is worse to me than watching an outing by the Sox' DoorMatt Young.

Of course there are exceptions, and athletes who are constantly contributing to charities and donating time show that there is still some good left in sports. Then again, look at Mike Tyson and Don King; the world of sports is falling — fast.

In a showdown of the No. 1 players, Providence's Kristen Brooks defeated Shizuko Yamasaki 6-0, 6-2. UMass's No. 2 player, Gail Girasella, lost to Jen Dullea 6-3, 6-3.

The Minutewomen's two wins came in the No. 3 and 4 slots. Kerensa Eddy ousted Hilary Debbs 6-3, 6-3 and Amy Ryan staged a comeback from a 6-0 loss in the first set to win 0-6, 6-4, 6-3.

In addition to the two wins, UMass had a chance of evening the singles matches at three to three when Kerri Komiski took Laura Tozza to a third set, but Tozza fought her off and won the match 6-0, 4-6, 6-2.

"Winning that third match would have been the turning point for us," Gentzler said. "It would have given us the momentum we needed to go into the doubles, but they got it instead."

In other singles action, Kathy Meeker beat Stacy Scheckner, Sarah Nadolny lost to Karen Reedy, and Karen Taylor defeated Kelly Grim.

In doubles, Girasella and Eddy lost to Brooks and Debbs, Dullea and Hughes defeated Yamasaki and Komisnki, and Ryan and Scheckner lost to Tozza and Amy Mangano.

"It's very disappointing to lose when you come so close," Gentzler said. "But you can't get discouraged when your team goes out there and gives 110 percent. They are a bunch of fighters and I'm proud of them."

Men's tennis slammed by Connecticut

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team saw its record fall to 1-2 yesterday, as they dropped five of six singles matches to the University of Connecticut Huskies.

Tim Lipsky was the only singles winner for UMass, as he defeated Jeff Kuhen, 6-4, 2-6, 6-3. Lipsky is still undefeated (3-0) this season.

In first singles, Minuteman Lloyd Teitlebaum lost to Doug Knuth, 2-6, 3-6.

"We haven't beaten these guys in a while, and we weren't sure what to expect," said UConn coach Ben Kirtlend. "But once the match started, we saw how Dougie was rollin'."

UMass captain Paul Audet lost the third singles match, 4-6, 0-6 to David Weiss.

UConn's Matt Pressman took fourth singles from Len Levine, 6-7, 3-6.

Fifth singles went to Huskie Dan Gleza, who quickly disposed of Keith Murray, 6-1, 6-0.

"Danny came off right away," Kirtlend said.

The match stood at 4-1 in UConn's favor at that point. That put UMass' sixth singles player, Steve Davis, in a must-win situation. Davis had taken each of his first two matches to a third set, but had lost them both.

He took this match against Angelo Rosetti to a third set as well, but lost, 6-4, 3-6, 4-6. That win gave UConn the five wins it needed to capture the overall match, and doubles competition would have no bearing on the match.

In first doubles, Teitlebaum and Audet played Knuth and Kuhen, and in second doubles, Lipsky and Murray played Weiss and Pressman. The third doubles match, scheduled to have Levine and David Kleinman play Gleza and Rossetti, was cancelled due to its irrelevance.

UMass coach David Rivera definitely felt the Huskies were his toughest opponent, as they are "consistently solid from one through six in singles."

Next match: Tuesday, September 24, vs. Central Connecticut at Upper Boyden tennis courts.

Lloyd Teitlebaum and the men's tennis team were trounced by UConn yesterday.

Back then, when it was a game

Baseball cards were a small, but important part of my youth, and now the cardboard cut-outs with glossy photos are symbolizing the rapid deterioration of sports as a whole.

Topps Inc., manufacturer of sports cards, has announced that bubble gum will no longer be found in its packs of baseball cards. The rectangular, pink piece of sugar, has been eliminated not for its concrete texture or awful taste, but because card collectors feel that the gum is decreasing the value of their investments.

I never much liked the gum, although I recall wadding several pieces in my mouth as I searched for the elusive Bump Wills or Mike Schmidt, but the sweet candy smell which emanated as I tore the wax paper from the cards is one that can't be forgotten.

Now, because of a bunch of freaks who think the gum stains their cards, my children will never experience the olfactory sensation that I had as a child. The bottom line here, as in all sports and life in general, is — MONEY.

David Scott

I can't claim to remember a time when athletes played sports solely for a love of the game, and perhaps that time never existed, but I know there was a time when "holding out" was something you did with your hand to guarantee an agreement. I know there was a time when "strike" was what the pitcher threw and when "negotiations" were held between countries, not players and owners.

I know there was a time WHEN IT WAS A GAME.

In fact that was the title of an HBO special that aired this summer, in which rare home video footage of the early days of baseball where compiled for an hour-long documentary. Aside from being a thoroughly enjoyable hour in front of the tube, the collected films illustrated how much the game has changed.

I sat with my father and watched as players actually placed their gloves on the field at the end of each half inning, and I watched as the Gashouse Gang stood in a circle around home plate and displayed their comic wizardry with the baseball.

"Dad?" I asked. "Can you imagine Rickey Henderson leaving his glove on the field? He'd need a security deposit and someone's first born."

"This is when it was a game," my father said in his best Edward R. Murrow voice, pointing to the Zenith.

The only circles formed around home plate now are ones to watch Mike Greenwell charge at Mo "The Rock" Vaughn behind the batting cage. No trickery with the ball, no smiles, just million dollar athletes at the field to do their job.

Now of course the business major says, "Good, sports are a business, a multi-million, perhaps billion dollar business and these players should get as much as they can from whomever they can."

Fine, I'll agree sports are a business, but sports are also an integral part of our society. Reciting the 1967 Red Sox line-up is easier for some than giving the pledge of allegiance. So when modern day players don't know Jackie Robinson from Brooks Robinson, it takes away from not just the sport, but from our

Field hockey goes for fifth straight win at Totman today

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Possibly prompted by the "Roll UMass" spray-painted on the grass across from Totman Field, the rolling University of Massachusetts field hockey team puts their undefeated record on the line today at home against Providence College, 3:30.

So far this season, Providence (1-1) has had a strong midfield and strong goaltending and the Minutewomen (4-0) can not overlook them.

Cathy Guden is the strongest offensive threat for the Friars with 2 goals on 35 shots. Co-captain Jennifer Theberge leads the team in assists with two.

The Friars record this year is misleading. They had 84 shots on goal against Fairfield University, who only mustered 2. Providence won 3-0. In their second game, against the University of Connecticut, they outshot the Huskies 19-8, yet lost 1-0.

Providence coach Jackie Gladu-Barto is aware of UMass' strengths, and she expects a quick, well-controlled game.

"UMass has a lot of options to attack with on offense," Gladu-Barto said. "I think we have to control Sherlan Cabralis, and keep the ball away from her. I think another key is Kathy Phelan."

Gladu-Barto said that the game will be very competitive, adding that the two teams match up well against each other.

"I think our midfield is as strong or stronger than UMass'," Gladu-Barto said. "The contest will be decided by one goal either way."

In order to win the match, UMass must step up their penalty corner shots. They managed to score a goal against Temple on a penalty corner. Penalty corners are a dangerous weapon, and UMass must work on capitalizing on them more.

Sophomore Jenn Salisbury leads the Minutewomen in scoring with four goals, and senior Dawn Trumbauer is second with three. The two forwards must lead the offensive attack today if UMass is going to score on Providence goaltender Debbie Haggie.

If UMass keeps their winning streak going through the weekend, the national poll will reflect their strength. The first NCAA poll comes out next week. UMass has demonstrated their ability to play with some of the best teams in the country, including Temple and Northwestern.

A big reason for this is the strength of the defense. The Minutewomen have only given up two goals this year, thanks in large part to sweeper Tracy Barclay, goalie Philippa Scott, and the rest of the defenders.

Coach Pam Hixon's strategy involves team defensive play, with every player helping out.

A large part of the season still remains, but so far the Minutewomen are rolling, as their undefeated record indicates. The key now, as always, is, according to Hixon, "take it one game at a time."

HEADS UP: Tara Jelley races down the field as she is swarmed by defenders. The field hockey team hosts Providence today at 3:30 p.m., at Totman Field.

Women's tennis falls to Providence

By LILLIAN K. LEGGIO
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday, the scorching heat outside the Upper Boyden tennis courts was almost too unbearable for spectators. Can you imagine what it was like for the University of Massachusetts and Providence College women's tennis teams?

Forget the heat. The two squads played fast paced, relentless tennis that tested both teams' endurance and stamina and ended in a disappointing 7-2 loss for UMass.

Providence's strategy was to wear down the Minutewomen by making UMass play at a swifter pace than that to which they were accustomed. UMass coach Edwin Gentzler expressed concern for the fast pace of the matches and hoped that the heat would slow Providence down. Unfortunately for UMass, the Lady Friars were unyielding and eventually wore the Minutewomen down.

Townes declines position, SAO directorship still open

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The top choice of both the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association and the administration for the interim directorship of the Student Activities Office declined to accept the position yesterday.

Associate Dean of Academic Affairs Ricardo Townes cited "family considerations" as the basis for his decision to decline the 11-month position. The directorship of SAO was vacated late last month when it was announced that current director, Irene Carew, would be leaving her post for an 11-month professional improvement leave effective Sept. 15.

"[Declining the post] was basically for personal reasons — it was a family decision," Townes said. "There was a lot of uncertainty about the time demands of the job."

Townes said he was aware of the strong support he received from both the SGA leadership and from members of the administration and faculty.

"I'm extremely grateful to the students who suggested me," Townes said. "It's great to have the Chancellor and Vice Chancellor express confidence in my ability to help them develop their willingness to work with students."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin said Townes' decision will force the administration to rethink its efforts to hire an interim director for SAO.

"[The decision] was a disappointment," Vanin said. "There were a lot of issues [for Townes] to think about — I knew it could go either way."

Vanin added that she would be considering others beyond the original five candidates for the position. Besides Townes, SAO Program Director Jose Tolson and Director of Off-Campus Housing Joanne Levenson are candidates.

Sarah Boy, special assistant to the vice chancellor for student affairs, and Charles Dimare, director of the Legal Services Office, are also candidates.

"I'm rethinking beyond the original five," Vanin said. "I need to take time to consider others — I'm not going to limit myself to the original five."

Vanin said she would be meeting with student leaders to discuss the appointment. The SGA leadership has made it clear that Dimare and Townes were their top choices for the position.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said the SGA's position hasn't changed with Townes' declining to take the position.

"We've already made our statement," Newnan said. "There's no need to reorder our priorities — we know where we stand."

Newnan said he, SGA President David Gagne and Speaker of the Student Senate Robert Monaghan met with Vanin last week to make clear that any candidate from within SAO or the Vice Chancellor's office would be "unnacceptable."

Newnan added that while none of the individual candidates were being "labeled as unacceptable" the SGA leadership wouldn't be able to work with anyone from SAO or the Vice Chancellor's office.

Vanin said that while the SGA's position entered into her decision to offer the job to Townes, it was not the only reason.

"I took everything into perspective," Vanin said. "While I considered the students' position, it was not the only reason [for offering the position to Townes]."

Wisdom for Greek area; Lecturer gives advice

By BRIAN O'NEILL
Collegian Correspondent

Dr Will Keim, traveling lecturer and greek chapter guru, challenged an audience of over six hundred fraternity and sorority members last night to develop their multi-cultural, leadership and ethical values.

"You are going to school at a time like no other time before," Keim said. "We are living in the age of the global village...We have to focus our energy on getting along better."

Keim, who has lectured at over five hundred colleges and to over a million students in the United States went on to say that he wished he could blindfold everyone's prejudices.

Keim, a greek chapter alumni, stressed the importance of study and the work ethic to the audience.

"If you're a jerk off about studying in college, you'll jerk off later in life," he said. "But if you do all the studying in college you'll be smiling."

Fraternities and sororities have a heritage mandating honor written into their national charters that each chapter should be held responsible for, Keim said.

"In the greek world historically all national chapters have in some document a list of things they honor which includes this: leadership, brotherhood, sisterhood, community service, scholarship and responsibility sexually," Keim said.

While greeks may have a bad reputation in school, they are more likely to achieve success after graduation, according to Keim.

"A man said to me the other day: 'I thought all greeks were no good, just party animals,'" Keim narrated. "I said to him that's absolutely wrong."

Howie Davis presses on

SID a class act despite setbacks

By DAVID SCOTT
Collegian Staff

Howard Davis foresees a time when his days will be filled with long volleys, Red Sox games and white sandy beaches, but for the time being his schedule is dominated by lengthy telephone conversations, 60-hour work-weeks and mounds of paperwork.

A man who describes himself as "intense," and who others call "concerned" and "efficient," Davis, 48, oversees the University of Massachusetts Sports Information Department, the office responsible for the publicity of all varsity athletic teams.

With a work load that few would envy, Davis offers a refreshing voice on the UMass campus at a time when most talk centers on budget shortfalls and lack of office help.

Davis, an avid tennis player and Red Sox fan, refuses to dwell on such matters, preferring instead to praise those around him.

"Why should I spout off, when we're all in the same boat?" asks Davis who is in his 12th year occupying the SID office on the second floor of the Boyden building. "The department couldn't be run without a super secretary, Ruthie Drew, and outstanding students. I feel we do as good a job as we can with the resources we have."

While Davis admits that his staff is one of the smallest of any Division I program its size, he praises the dedication of his two graduate assistants and a host of undergraduates, who make serving the media an easier task.

Easier perhaps, but by no means simple, Davis supervises and takes part in duties including media relations, compiling publications, disseminating news releases, computing various statistics and photography.

With such a list of responsibilities, the only speed Davis knows is overdrive and the days between Labor Day and Memorial Day are a logjam of appointments, phone calls and paperwork. His work hardly goes unnoticed within the campus community and on a broader scale, throughout the country.

Football coach Jim Reid describes Davis as a combination of "energy, professionalism, and a very caring man."

Reid's relationship with Davis extends beyond the 100 yards of grass. The two have

Rosenberg offering 'cold and hard' truth

Candidate for State Senate, Stanley Rosenberg, drives a point home.

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

State Representative Stanley Rosenberg of Amherst believes his lifelong connection to the public system will allow him to better represent his constituency if he succeeds in his bid to fill the State Senate seat vacated by John Olver.

"I've always been interested in the public sector," Rosenberg said. "All my jobs since college have been in the public sector — I'm a beneficiary of the public system."

Rosenberg pointed to the fact that he grew up in a foster home, attended public schools, and graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1977 as evidence of his commitment to public institutions.

"I'm motivated to build a government that is both efficient and responsible," Rosenberg said. "Government can play a role in advancing civilization."

Rosenberg is competing against Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin in a special election on Sept. 24 to fill the State Senate seat vacated by John Olver, who was elected to the US House of Representatives on June 4.

Rosenberg, in his third term in the State Legislature, noted that voters must restore the faith in government institutions that has declined in recent years.

"People have to have faith and trust in government — that has declined in the past few decades," Rosenberg said. "People are tired of hearing simplistic answers and slogans from politicians. "What they want is the truth, even if it is cold and hard," Rosenberg said.

While Rosenberg has carved out a reputation as a strong advocate of higher education, he pointed to his role in saving the Springfield Recycling Center, fighting an income tax increase on senior citizens and helping to change the laws to allow communities to override Proposition 2 1/2 with a simple majority as other sources of pride in his legislative record.

In light of the severe budget cuts to the public higher education system in recent years, Rosenberg said a new consensus on

Yeltsin experiences mild heart pain

MOSCOW (AP) — Russian President Boris N. Yeltsin complained of heart pains today and left his office to rest at home, but his spokesman said the condition was not serious and Yeltsin will resume work Thursday.

A secretary in Yeltsin's office and a spokesman for his press office said he went home after being examined by his doctor.

The severity of Yeltsin's condition was not immediately clear.

The Russian government's news agency, Tass news agency and a secretary in Yeltsin's office said the 60-year-old politician suffered a "minor heart attack." The independent Interfax news agency called it a "cardiac insufficiency."

But Yeltsin's spokesman and the Russian Information Agency said the president's condition was not serious enough to prevent him from giving a speech to the Russian legislature Thursday.

His press secretary, Pavel Voshchanov, said Yeltsin's ailment was less serious than a heart attack.

"I'd rather say he felt some pain in the heart," Voschanov told The Associated Press. "In the morning he told his secretary that he was not feeling well. But he came out of the office himself and got into the car that took him home."

In Russian, the word heart attack has a broader meaning than in English and is commonly used to refer to a range of ailments from chest pains to actual heart failure.

After the abortive coup in August, Yeltsin emerged as the most popular political figure in the Soviet Union. He is leading the effort to work out a new power-sharing agreement between the central government and the republics.

Yeltsin appeared in good health in recent public appearances. He has no known health problems, although he disappeared briefly from public view after a car accident last September. Officials said he suffered a bruised hip and bumped his head.

Kerrey going for White House win

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey said today he was establishing a "Kerrey for President" committee and he scheduled a formal announcement of his presidential intentions for Sept. 30.

Kerrey said he was filing papers with the Federal Election Commission and setting up the campaign committee in preparation for a potential bid for the Democratic nomination. The senator has been telling Democrats privately that he intends to run.

The senator said he would announce his decision in Lincoln, his hometown. He also named Hugh Westbrook, a Florida businessman, as treasurer of his national campaign and Washington attorney Jack Quinn as general counsel.

Kerrey's filing with the FEC fulfills federal requirements for a presidential campaign and allows him to begin raising and spending money on the race.

Kerrey, 48, served one term as governor of Nebraska and was elected to the Senate in 1988. He is a Vietnam veteran who lost part of his leg in the war and won the Congressional Medal of Honor for his service there.

Last week, Kerrey announced that his administrative assistant, Bill Shore, would be leaving his Senate staff before the end of the year to work on his campaign. Shore is a former aide to Gary Hart.

Kerrey spent last weekend in Boston on what he called "a political trip."

"We are organizing," he said. "I would like to be prepared."

Three Democrats have formally announced their candidacies: Virginia Gov. Douglas Wilder, Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin, and former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas.

'Freddy' molester gets prison term

NAPLES, Fla. (AP)—A man who calls himself Freddy Krueger, after the main character of the "Nightmare on Elm Street" horror movies, has been sentenced to 22 years in prison on sexual molestation charges.

Fred Wayne Ashley, 20, was sentenced Tuesday after he pleaded no contest to sexual battery on a 15-year-old girl. Ashley, of Naples, was arrested March 12.

Prosecutors had said Ashley was obsessed with the "Nightmare on Elm Street" movies and adopted the movie character's trademark tactic of attacking people in their sleep.

Prosecutors said Ashley had been charged with sexual battery in 1988 for allegedly molesting a 9-year-old girl in her sleep. At that time, he was still a juvenile.

UMass student to help relief efforts in war-ravaged Liberia

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

While the West African nation of Liberia, torn by civil war, is far-removed from the lives of most members of the University of Massachusetts community, a UMass graduate student will be experiencing events there firsthand.

William Lanford, a graduate student in the department of resource economics, will be travelling to Liberia to help distribute food and other resources raised here in Massachusetts by the Liberian Education Fund. The Fund, established in the spring of 1990 on the UMass campus, raised $7,500 for the relief of Liberian refugees who were displaced by the civil war.

Lanford noted that Liberia, founded in 1822 as a colony for emancipated slaves, has had a long connection with the United States. He said the Bush administration shouldn't be so quick to abandon a long-standing ally.

"Since the civil war began, Liberians have been starving to death throughout West Africa," Lanford said. "The US has abandoned Liberia because it doesn't need it any more now that the Cold War is over."

The civil war which began in December 1989 has caused the deaths of over 30,000 Liberians, destroyed the homes of 600,000 people within the country and driven over 700,000 Liberians into refuge in other West African countries.

Liberia has been occupied by a combination of forces from surrounding countries such as Ghana and Nigeria, who are battling rebel forces under Charles Taylor, the leader of the National Patriotic Front of Liberia.

"The West African forces are unable to gain control of the political situation in Liberia," Lanford said, adding that the need for US aid was imperative.

"While the US is always helping countries such as Lithuania to gain independence, why don't they help a country that has already developed a market economy?" Lanford said. "Since Liberia isn't a part of this country's foreign policy, it is ignored."

Lanford added that Liberia has never been controlled by any European colonial power, in contrast to most other African countries.

Lanford, who will be in Liberia until mid-October, will be meeting six other members of the Liberian Education Fund to try to set up a permanent office for the Fund in Monrovia, the country's capital.

A sordid tale of ethics and money

Treasurer Malone accuses senator of pilfering pensions

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Two Republicans — a state senator and the state treasurer — brought a fight over the ethics into the open, hurling charges and denials at each other over a past business proposal.

State Treasurer Joe Malone accused Sen. Henri Rauschenbach, a fellow Republican, of a conflict of interest and conduct unbecoming a state senator, but the senator defended his actions yesterday.

Malone said Rauchenbach, of Brewster, failed to disclose his link to a money manager when he and another investment fund manager pitched a $50 million pension investment proposal to the treasurer's office. After the treasurer's office rejected the plan, Rauschenbach began working on legislation to dilute the treasurer's oversight of pension investments, Malone said.

Malson called on the State Ethics Committee to investigate Rauschenbach.

"His actions in my opinion were inappropriate and absolutely unbecoming of a legislator," Malone said.

Rauschenbach denied any breach of ethics in his actions. "There's been some suggestion that the individual who proposed this idea is connected somewhat financially to my former employer. I don't believe that at all. Otherwise, I wouldn't have done it," Rauschenbach said.

The senator said Tuesday he quit his job with the money management firm in question earlier that day and asked for an ethics committee probe on his own.

Rauschenbach said he began pressing for an overhaul of the way the treasurer's office oversees the pension fund for teachers and state employees long before the investment proposal was rejected.

Rauschenbach worked for a company owned by Carmen W. Elio, whose pension investment recommendations to cities, towns and counties have been the target of investigative reports in The Boston Globe.

Rauschenbach said he resigned from his position with Elio's firm. Faneuil Hall Capitol Group, on Tuesday, after working for the company for six months.

He said he was paid between $10,000 and 20,000 to serve as a consultant.

Rauschenbach said he sought advice on the conflict of interest statute from his attorney when he agreed to work for the firm. "Joe Malone knew I was on Carmen Elio's payroll," he said.

But Malone said he did not know of the connection.

• The Faculty Club in Stockbridge House was broken into yesterday morning. The manager reported no missing items but two doors were damaged and a cellar window cover was broken.

• Charles N. Lenchner, 22, of Hadley, was arrested Monday night during a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue and charged with driving with a revoked license and a defective headlight.

• The building staff of Hasbrouck reported an elderly woman acting in a suspicious manner Monday morning.

Correction

A statement attributed to Jerry, an openly gay sophmore in the Sept.17 story "GLB Students and the roommate shuffle" was incorrect. The correct statement is: Jerry said he believed his roommate was afraid of living with him because his roomate had never met an openly gay man before.

HIV virus travels highways

By ELIZABETH CHRISTOPHER
Collegian Correspondent

Triggered by the recent news of the rising number of AIDS cases in Massachusetts, a University of Massachusetts cartographer has produced a series of maps illustrating the spreading AIDS epidemic in the state and the modes of transmission.

Cartographer Roy Doyon and a graduate student assistant discovered an increase in AIDS cases in cities on major transportation routes such as Interstate 95 and Routes 2 and 495.

Boston, Springfield, Brockton, and New Bedford had particularly high AIDS increases.

Doyon was not surprised by the pattern and commented that similiar patterns emerged during a yellow fever epidemic in the 19th century.

Doyon said the AIDS virus, which has killed more Americans than the Korean and Vietnam Wars combined, is carried mainly by travelers who frequent prostitutes or are in contact with drug-users.

Among all the state's data on AIDS, Doyon was surprised to find no maps pinpointing its spread through the Commonwealth. With Tom Donovan, a student cartographer in the geology/geography department, they began plotting last spring the state's annual data on the AIDS problem onto maps.

It's not traveling alone that is the problem, but the practices of travelers that spread the virus, Doyon said. The increase in cases is not prevalent in college towns, Doyon said, possibly because students tend to be aware of the risks and take precautions.

AIDS increases were also found in a number of cities where intravenous drug use is rampant. Springfield and New Bedford had the highest number of such cases.

"It's a problem of urban decay," said Doyon, who has been criticized by state agencies who fear maps pinpointing the geographical increase of AIDS across the state will stigmatize communities and racial groups.

On a national level, AIDS increase among women is 10 percent, but it's as high as 27 percent in some towns in Massachusetts, such as New Bedford, that have a large prostitution problem. Twenty-five percent of the infants of those women with AIDS will also get the virus.

The maps display a bar graph that breaks the cases down by race, showing the largest increase to be among Blacks and Latinos. The graph also depicts the mode of transmission: homosexual and bisexual, intravenous drug use, homosexual and intravenous drug use, heterosexual and other ways of transmission.

"The public has a right to know," said Doyon. "If the government expects behavioral changes in people, they must know."

Nationwide studies show that the majority of people are not practicing safe sex and the "it can't happen to me" syndrome is ever-present.

This slowly spreading epidemic will claim one out of 100 people by the year 2000, according to health officials.

"Rural areas especially need to be educated through state programs and condom posters," he said.

Doyon's funds will cover the production of 1,000 copies of the AIDS map; in addition, Hampshire College recently made a donation toward Doyon and Donovan's efforts, but "the state has no money [to put toward the project]," said Doyon.

Cease-fire crumbles as war plagues Croatia

By TONY SMITH
Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia — The latest cease-fire in Croatia was swiftly unraveling yesterday as fierce new fighting was reported on land, in the air and at sea. The chief European negotiator said if this truce fails, there is little more that mediators can do.

The fresh violence in the breakaway republic followed a night of heavy shelling and bombing that for the first time reached Zagreb, the Croatian capital. The number of casualties in the latest fighting was not known.

Today in Zagreb, after the truce was to have taken effect, rounds of rapid sniper fire could be heard. At one point, people standing in front of the city's railway station threw themselves under cars as nearby gunfire rang out and sporadic explosions boomed south of the tracks.

Croatia has already lost one-third of its republic to Serbian rebels who refuse to allow Croatia to secede from Yugoslavia.

The fighting was initially between ethnic Serbs opposing independence and Croatia, with the army saying it was intervening only to separate them. However, federal forces have become increasingly engaged.

Croatia says the federal army is helping Serbia, the largest Yugoslav republic, make a grab for Croation territory, Serbia denies the charge, but says Croatia must give up Serb-dominated areas if it secedes from Yugoslavia.

On Tuesday night, shelling and air attacks damaged an airport, broadcast transmitters and other buildings in Zagreb. Federal air force jets swooped out of the night sky and were greeted by the flash of anti-aircraft fire.

Shelling and gunfire could be heard from many directions, and machine-gun fire rattled across the city at dawn.

Fighting across Croatia on Tuesday left at least 34 people dead and 33 wounded, reports said, and the federal air force said two of its planes were shot down in eastern Croatia.

This morning, federal army planes bombed Sljene Mountain, north of Zagreb, according to the Croatian Defense Ministry, and explosions were heard in the city's southern suburbs. But federal authorities denied there had been an air strike.

Croatian television said the air raid alert was in effect for about 20 cities, including Zagreb. Frightened residents huddled in bomb shelters.

A Croatian Defense Ministry spokesman claimed four Yugoslav air force jets had been downed today, but Federal officials denied that as well.

However, the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug later said it had confirmed that one air force plane was downed over Petrinja, south of Zagreb. It said the pilot managed to bail out.

At Verazdin, north of Zagreb, and Gospic, south of the republic's capital, fighting raged around federal army barracks, said Gen. Andrija Raseta, deputy commander of federal army units in Zagreb. A European Community monitor was wounded, he said.

Croatian military officials claimed grenades were being fired from the federal army barracks in Verazdin.

Also today, a Croation defense spokesman said three federal army boats were destroyed in fierce battles at the Adriatic port of Sibenik. A day earlier, Yugoslav navy gunboats blockaded Dubrovnik and other Adriatic ports, where much of Croatia's imports arrive.

Croat defense officials also said one Galeb warplane was downed at Sibenik. Yugoslav planes also were reported destroyed in Sisak and Petrinja, 30 miles south of Zagreb.

The Tanjug news agency later reported that Sibenik radio was calling on the federal army garrison to surrender immediately or face "total annihilation."

The latest truce was shepherded through by European Community negotiators and signed Tuesday afternoon in the Adriatic seaside resort of Igalo. The deadline passed at noon (6 a.m. EDT) today.

"Did you know that all but two presidents since 1850 were greeks and that 85 percent of the Fortune Five Hundred have been greeks?"

The character of the greek area is underrated, Keim said.

"A man said to me: 'Greeks are racist and sexist,'" Keim continued. "I said, 'Martin Luther King was a greek and so is Jesse Jackson and Thuroughgood Marshall.'"

Keim asked that greeks focus on seven points for a happy life: study more, exercise a half an hour a day, make a lot of friends, act sexually responsibility, do not use drugs, if they must use alcohol, to use it in moderation, to be aware and to love one another.

Keim told the audience not to buy into Hollywoods' hype about sex and to watch movie stars' personal lives before choosing them as role models.

"I wish you would not believe in this Hollywood bullshit about sex, but look at the four different times they went to the Betty Ford Clinic," he said.

Keim peppered his lecture with jokes.

"A guy says my feelings for you go way beyond words," he said. "girl says, 'well write me a letter.'"

"They say marijuana is not as bad as alcohol, but when was the last time you saw your buddy eat a five pound block of cheese?" Keim said.

Iranian terrorists to release hostage

By RIMA SALAMEH
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Iran's state-run news agency said a Western hostage, probably Briton Jack Mann, would be freed today.

"Another Western hostage in Beirut will be released in the next few hours," the report early this afternoon quoted unidentified sources as saying. It was filed by the Islamic Republic News Agency's correspondent in Beirut.

Speculation has centered on Mann since pro-Iranian kidnappers released his photograph last week, following the freeing of some Arab prisoners by Israel. U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar has been working on a broad-based deal that would free Lebanese prisoners held by Israel, the 11 Western hostages and account for Israeli soldiers missing in Lebanon.

The Iranian report quoted "informed sources" in Beirut as saying "it seems that retired British pilot Jack Mann stands a better chance of release among other Western hostages."

The British charge d'affairs in Beirut, John Tucknott, said he had "no firm news to suggest that this report is correct."

But in Damascus, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa said of a possible hostage release: "Yes, I'm optimistic there may be one soon."

Mann's wife, Sunnie, was taken to the British Embassy in East Beirut by body guards in a Range Rover.

higher education is emerging in this state.

"The old consensus was that higher education was inefficient, that tuition was too low and appropriations were too high," Rosenberg said. "The new consensus is that the system is in trouble — we are on the verge of slipping to second-rate status and need to reverse that trend."

Rosenberg pointed to Gov. Weld's reorganization bill for higher education, which added the former University of Lowell and Southern Massachusetts University to the UMass system effective Sept. 1, as a positive step for the state's university system.

"The reorganization bill is the first signal that state government is taking us more seriously," Rosenberg said. "We're not out of the woods yet — the fiscal situation is improving slowly and slightly.

"I'm hopeful we've seen the last of the cuts," Rosenberg said. "The question now is how quickly we can rebuild."

After graduating from UMass in 1977, Rosenberg worked for eight years as Director of Community Development and Human Services in the UMass Division of Continuing Education. Prior to his service in the State Legislature, Rosenberg served as an administrative aide to John Olver from 1980 to 1983, as executive director from 1983 to 1985, and as district director for Congressman Chester Atkins from 1985 to 1986.

I've got to quit smoking

I have to quit, I have to quit, I have to quit! I tell myself this everyday. My vice? Cigarettes.

I remember when I first started smoking during my parents' divorce in my Junior year of high school. I told myself that I would never become a slave to the addiction of nicotine. Yet here I sit, in the second semester of my Junior year at college, a total nicotine junkie.

Todd Kane

It's scary now to think back on my past and not remember when I didn't smoke. All I have to do to regain my memory is look at old hockey photographs of myself, smiling and pink-lunged. I remember being on four different teams in the same season, including a regional Team USA squad. Yes, hockey was my life before I cast myself into Marlboro Country.

How stupid are we smokers? It's not as though the non-smoking community has been hiding the dangers of smoking from us — we are not illiterates. I like to think of myself as a relatively intelligent individual who is addicted to the voluntary intake of toxin into my body. I imagine it would be difficult to try to convince other people from an Iron Lung, or worse, from beyond.

How hard can it be to quit? I mean, on a sheerly economic level, smoking is expensive and college students are poor. The two do not mix. From personal experience, I have found quitting smoking to be an enormous undertaking. I attempted to quit last semester and failed miserably.

As soon as I smoked my last cigarette, my life changed quickly — for the worse. Gone were the pleasures of that "after-dinner b[illegible]t." The "butt with a beer" routine was a [illegible]ing memory. I felt depressed but swore [illegible]y success.

I headed to campus the next day and witnessed a full-blown metamorphisis. It seemed as though the entire UMass student body had gotten together in the Cage the night before and agreed to start smoking until Todd Kane's attempt to quit failed.

Everyone was smoking! The birds were chirping "Marlboro" from the trees. The Tower library looked like a big cigarette. I fell into a mania of nicotine withdrawl delirium.

For eight full days I lived this wretched existence. Because I had been experiencing insomnia since the day I quit, I decided to start again out of my body's basic need for sleep.

However convenient it was for me to begin smoking again, I really have got to quit again. Someone upstairs is giving me some major hints about my impending doom if I remain a smoker.

My ex-girlfriend's father was and still is a dedicated smoker. Over the summer, I chatted with my ex-girlfriend. She informed me that her father had his third heart attack in five years the day before. The man continues to smoke two packs of unfiltered Camels per day. Regardless of his heart attacks, I used to witness his morning wretchings. I saw him expel chunks of what I called "lung butter" into the bathroom sink. Still, I continued to smoke.

Tuesday morning, I received a call from my sister informing me that my best friend's father was in the hospital due to a heart attack. This is the man who loved cigarettes so much, he used to tell his wife that he had quit smoking and sneak butts in the bathroom of his own house. Worst of all, the man is a genius! He is a professor of Math and Science at Mass. Maritime Academy. This is the man I always thought to be rather peculiar because he enjoyed coming home from work and doing Calculus problems for fun.

I have come to the conclusion that quitting smoking has nothing to do with intelligence. It is a matter of common sense. I hope you smokers did not overlook this column because you thought it was just going to be another preachy diatribe. I did not write it to preach. I wrote it so that both you and I might realize how bad smoking really is. We are killing ourselves voluntarily — what are we going to do about it?

Todd Kane is a UMass student

Other communities have space; we deserve it too

UMass is considered a haven by many gay, lesbian, and bisexual students who have heard or read about the LBGA, The Program, the University's non-discrimination statement, and the Student Code of Conduct, which forbids harassment based on sexual orientation.

Trystan Skeigh

I am among those gay, lesbian, and bisexual students who have come from afar to finish my education here. I believe that students at UMass should feel proud that they are part of an institute that welcomes diversity within its student body.

Although the climate at this University is much better for gay, lesbian, and bisexual students than many other institutions, it's still not good enough.

Gay, lesbian, and bisexual freshman and sophomores go through hell because they are forced to live on campus in the residence halls without any special considerations by Housing for their needs as a community. Every year GLB residents are harassed in the residence halls.

Physical assaults are all too common. Nearly every GLB resident is a victim of verbal harassment. Last semester several GLB residents had to be removed from their halls to ensure their physical safety because they had received death threats.

There are special halls and buildings for every other conceivable social community on this campus. Students who are part of the ALANA community have a separate hall available, and women have an entire wing to themselves in Van Meter. There is also a hall for students who are vegetarian and chem-free.

Yet there is no designated residence hall on which gays and lesbians can live as a community.

In the past, gays and lesbians have sort of co-opted the Social Diversity floor in Central, but that floor was not designed to meet the specific needs of that community, and every year, GLB residents there have to deal with heterosexual students moving onto the floor and sometimes reacting very negatively to the homosexual community established there.

I support the concept behind the Social Diversity floor. I think there should be a hall for people of different races and sexual orientations to mingle if they want. But I don't think it's fair for gay students to have that as their only reasonably safe living option.

Not all GLB students want to spend their on-campus home lives educating their heterosexual peers. Some don't mind, and I think that's wonderful, but a lot of us would like to be able to just come home and peacefully hang within our own community.

Yet, unlike ALANA students, who have the social diversity option and a separate ALANA corridor, GLB residents have a very different set of options: they can either live in the closet on regular dorm floors and pray they don't get discovered and harassed, or they can move to the diversity floor, where they know there will still be some harassment, but at least they'll be living with other GLB students.

Some students object to separate communities. It makes them uncomfortable to think that maybe there are people out there that don't want to live with them. I think that students who feel that way need to try to engage in empathy for the minority student communities who wish to live apart.

It's not about judging the majority. It's about coming home and spending time with the people you feel comfortable with, that are most like yourself. And it's a privilege the majority takes for granted.

Gays and lesbians are still battling for civil rights. We are one of the few oppressed social groups that still do not have legal recourse in 44 states. Nor are we mentioned in the Bill of Rights.

The extent of oppression we deal with on a daily basis is so severe that we depend on the support within our community to survive. Emotionally, psychologically, and physically.

It is an act of extreme insensitivity to our needs as an oppressed community to deny us a safe place to live on this campus. I hope that the decision-makers in Whitmore take the values embodied in the nondiscrimination policy more to heart. Gay, lesbian and bisexual students on this campus deserve a safe place to live.

Graduate students need to stand up and take self-control

Have you heard what our TAs are talking about? The current crisis is already affecting the quality of education offered, and therefore, undergraduates need to decide whether or not to get involved.

The graduate employees at UMass have come to a crucial moment. The decision they make in the next week will definitely affect the rest of their careers here at UMass and the rest of their lives. Their decision will do the same for the undergrads. At this point, the option does not exist for the proverbial "turning back." There is only one decision to make, and upon that decision rests the terms of undergraduate and graduate definition.

They must decide, each of them and all of them: do they feel that they are indeed employees, that they indeed produce for their employers, and are therefore entitles to the inherent right of employees?

If the answer is "no," then all they need to do is let the administration fail to meet the terms of their contract. Then, the loose association of graduate employees will have defined itself as just that: a loose association of graduate employees.

Their record of victories will be tarnished. The momentum they have created though continuous struggles and victories will disappear, and the owners of their careers (as the administration in all of its various bureaucratic manifestations will certainly then have defined itself) will continue to dictate to them how they will spend the rest of their lives.

On the other hand, if they decide to answer the above question with a resounding "yes!" — if they reaffirm the notion that their work is their work, that the environments in which they labor are their environments, that they indeed have the consciousness to define who they are and what they want to be — then they need only follow their beliefs.

James Henninger

They need only to stand up, sit-in and teach-in (and if necessary — strike) to define themselves a a union of people who will not tolerate the abuse of their rights by the administration (an organization of people who administer the decisions that the graduate employees also agree upon).

If the graduate students fail to define themselves now as a union, they never will. This is the crucial moment. I propose, however, that they are a union, that they need to be a union and that the benefit of being a union is not an excess demand. The demands do not go beyond what is "fair."

The union is not ignoring the fiscal troubles of their employer, and more to the point, as employees who have long-term investments in their careers here, the union is motivated by what is best for their employer as well as for themselves. The union does not wish to compete with their employer on anything other than an even playing field.

In short, I believe that they have the right and the ability to define who they are and what they will become, and I call the question before the entire graduate body: Do you feel that you are indeed employees and are therefore entitled to the inherent rights of employees?

Undergraduates also have the right to define who they are and who they want to be. If the graduate student employees fail to gain their rights of self-determination, then the undergraduates will never have any freedoms in their own careers except those freedoms given to them by the administration. Freedom, whenever it is given, may just as easily be taken away.

Therefore, I call the question before the entire undergraduate body: do you feel that you have the right to determine your own destiny, to have a voice in who educates you about matters and how they do it? Upon your answer rests the decision of your action. If "no," then don't forget your teacher's apple. If "yes," then support the actions of your TAs.

THE CRUMBLING OF THE SOVIET UNION

Official warns of false alarms

I'd like to take this opportunity to welcome students back to the campus, and in so doing, also inform them upon an infringement upon their rights and safety. I'm speaking about a situation which at the time it occurs may seem inconvenient or even festive, but nonetheless is dangerous. I'm referring to the malicious activation of fire alarms.

Last year there were 118 such activations on campus — almost double that of the previous year. Last weekend there were eight, all in Southwest. Now, since all our students are young adults who know the difference between right and wrong, I don't have to explain that the malicious activation of a fire alarm system is a criminal offense in Massachusetts, carrying a monetary fine and/or jail term if convicted.

Also, since students pay more to attend this institution this year, it might be interesting to know that malicious fire alarms cost money, as the resources of the Amherst Fire Department and at least three different University entities are involved in responding to fire alarms.

Furthermore, these needless alarms take a human toll. Each year, several of our students are injured while evacuating, from falls or sprains. Nationwide last year 29 firefighters were killed in traffic accidents while responding. The number of civilians killed likewise was not reported, but a 20 ton fire apparatus versus an automobile does not bode well for the latter.

Additionally, students who hail from large communities probably have dozens of firefighters on duty stationed strategically throughout, so one false alarm doesn't deplete firefighting resources.

In Amherst there are only six firefighters on duty, three each in two stations. These personnel also staff an ambulance. A false alarm on campus places the nearest ambulance out of service as the crew must respond with the fire apparatus. If a medical emergency then occurs, there will be a delay in the ambulance response as personnel from the other station must handle the call. Of course, if that station also is on a response of their own, then the delay will be even more significant.

Last year apparatus response to an actual fire was delayed because the crew was on campus answering what turned out to be a false alarm.

Finally, and most important in my view, is the effect a false alarm has on the students and guests in a residence hall. Each time the fire alarm sounds, residents become apathetic to it's warning. Some residents decide "It's just another false alarm, so I don't have to evacuate. Of course, they don't know this for sure (unless they pulled the alarm or know who did).

Many people believe that a fire couldn't possibly effect them in a steel and concrete building anyway. People forget about the toxcity of the smoke produced, however. It's smoke that kills in most fires, not the flame itself. Look around a room and one realizes that there is ample fuel to sustain a significant fire.

So, any time the fire alarm sounds — EVACUATE. The University is spending over $1 million a year to improve fire safety. Do your part so you don't become one of the 5,000 who will perish in fires this year in America.

Housing Services offers a $500 reward to anyone who furnishes information about the identity of false fire alarm pranksters. Malicious fire alarms are not something that has to be tolerated. They kill, they cost and they inconvenience. Do something about them — before they do something to you!

Column rebuked

I am compelled to respond to a September 16, 1991 column by Peter Kasperowics, "Are UMass unions part of the budget problem?"

Mr. Kasperowicz makes several outlandish statements in his column — least of all that "Unions are sucking up the cash." I would like to know how Mr. Kasperowicz reached this conclusion since Unionized state employees have not received a raise for over three years. In addition, the Weld administration has forced state employees to endure furloughs and has attacked employee health benefit insurance.

Mr. Kasperowics certainly owes an apology to every electrician on this campus for his statement about "the electrician who hasn't even lifted a finger for six months." Not only is this statement insulting to the electricians, it is offensive to all state employees.

Also, if Mr. Kasperowicz is not aware of it, I would remind him that just recently a total of 56 UMass employees were either laid off or relocated to lesser-paying jobs. Included in the 56 were 35 employees represented by AFSCME local 1776, none of which were highly paid. In fact, one laid off employee was a single parent with three children who had to take a six grade reduction in pay.

I do agree with the statement made that the UMass administration should have the right to manage, and one area they should begin to manage right away is the Daily Collegian and some of the totally irresponsible columnists that write for it.

Writer derides 'callous attitude'

In response to Pete Kasperowicz's column of Sept. 16, 1991, there were a few points that were misrepresented.

First of all, the administration cannot simply dismiss unions. The unions are not company unions — they are the duly elected representatives of the workers on campus. Besides, company unions are illegal. Read the laws.

Second, there are no unionized administrators on campus. SEIU local 509 represents professional staff on campus and they, for the most part, have some supervisory tasks. But they have bosses, the administrators.

Third, there is no worker on this campus that hasn't lifted a finger in six months and none are overpaid.

Unlike the Collegian staff, which collects $100,000 in payroll a year and still fills up the news section with AP articles that can be found in any other paper.

The only high-paying jobs on this campus belong to the administrators (who aren't unionized) and professors (who are).

Judging from Mr. Kasperowicz's concern for education, I am sure he was not referring to professors when he suggested to lay off UMass workers.

Obviously, he was not well-informed but worse yet, he has a callous attitude of hard economic times facing the working people on this campus. Usually they only complain about the policy makers but demand action against the state employees.

Over the past three or four years there have been no pay increases for state employees, including cost-of-living increases. The average pay for state employees is about $23,000 a year. With inflation rising at an average rate of 5 percent a year, state employees have actually taken pay cuts over that time period.

While the rest of us complain about a tax rate of 6.25 percent, we demand more work from and less pay for state employees and they still have to pay the same taxes as the rest of us. These people are not on work study, and they don't have financial aid. They are working for a living and have families to support.

Robb Smith

Chair of local 509 gives response

I must respond to the ignorant cheap shot presently taken by Peter Kasperowicz against UMass employees and their unions.

I guess it's always easier for some people to grasp at easy answers (regardless of the facts), or lash out at those least in positions of authority and responsibility when things are going badly.

The reason that students are paying so much more for public higher education is that the state government has drastically slashed its funding for the last four years — until this year, this was the only state to have done so, despite budget problems elsewhere that were even more severe than in Massachusetts.

Obviously, Mr. Kasperowicz doesn't know, or care to know, that we UMass employees have not received any pay increases for almost four years now, that many of us are paying more for our health insurance, that most of us have to work for several days without pay last spring because of the Weld "furlough," or that the graduate employees are among the lowest-paid in the Northeast.

Also, there have been hundreds of positions eliminated here by not filling vacancies, layoff notices have recently been sent to many employees, and workloads have increased dramatically for many others (I challenge Mr. Kasperowicz to find and identify any worker who "hasn't even lifted a finger for six months").

Despite Mr. Kasperowicz's blaming the victim (divide and conquer?) approach, employees and their unions have stood with students to impose the shameful dismantling of public higher education that is being done by the governor and Weldocrats in the Legislature.

Also despite his wishes that the unions would just go away (or be let go by management), we had every legal and constitutional right for unions to protect our collective interests, and we will not go away.

Our unions will continue to support UMass employees' interests, as well as quality, affordable public higher education for all, even Mr. Kasperowicz.

Column has 'no basis in reality'

I would like to briefly respond not necessarily to Peter Kasperowicz' September 16 editorial, but because of it. Although I could take issue with most of his editorial because it clearly had no basis in reality, I prefer to conserve my energy for the many fights we face that truly merit responses.

Let me just say, however, that in my time as a union activist on this campus I have heard the administration accused of many things but "keeping the unions in tact" is a new one.

The reason I write is to speak to the working women and men on this campus who not only have advocated for a quality, affordable education for our young people — after all they are the ones that know its true value — but who have also been fighting a long, hard battle just to maintain well-deserved contractual and statutory rights. No group is less deserving of Mr. Kasperowicz' slings and arrows.

To my brother and sister employees at UMass Amherst, I say forgive him for clearly he knows not of what he speaks. His editorial is a reminder that as much as we value it, not all lessons can be learned in a formal education.

To Mr. Kasperowicz, I suggest he redefine the enemy because it's not us.

THIS WEEKEND

THE BLUES ARE ALIVE AND WELL IN THE VALLEY

By BRIAN HARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

Once upon a time the blues reigned supreme on the local music scene. Some of the best radio programming in the Valley could be heard on the afternoon blues slots on WMUA. Internationally known blues acts performed to sell out crowds at Pearl Street and the Iron Horse. Almost every area nightclub hosted their own blues jam and any local band looking for work had to tell club managers that they played the blues in order to get a gig.

The blues scene reached it's pinnacle a few years back when Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton began their "Blue Monday" shows featuring Kenny Johnson, drummer for Steve Miller and James Cotton, and his all-star line-up of local blues artists. Sheehan's Cafe rapidly became the hub of the local music scene and shortly thereafter the club began a policy of booking regional blues acts almost every weekend. They came from music centers such as Providence R.I. and Boston Mass. and they including then unsigned acts such as Sugar Ray and the Bluetones and Treat Her Right. A "Blues Renaissance" took place in the Pioneer Valley. The now defunct L'Oasis nightclub in the basement of Thornes Market in Northampton featured the now legendary "Open Mike Blues Jam" from which many current bands, such as Free Press, got their start. Hosted by DJ "Blue Bill" Stepshew, the blues jam at L'Oasis attracted both amateur and professional alike and for a couple of years was the most hip scene around.

Then something terrible happened. The Valley blues scene just sort of withered up and disappeared. Some say it was because of overkill on the club bookings. Folks had too much of a good thing. Others say it occured when the staple of established blues jockeys on WMUA such as Blue Bill and Ellen Millermack departed the airwaves. Kenny Johnson left town for Chicago, L'Oasis closed up, and most of the top area blues musicians took a break from gigging or went elsewhere. Another revival took place on the local music scene. The dance beat took hold and new bands such as Who's Kiddin' Who, Rockin' Dave and the Rent Party, and Free Press mixed world beat, zydeco, and ska into original music that captivated local audiences. The blues jam was replaced with the "Band Jam" at Sheehan's.

Now the blues are making a return. The club listings for the coming week feature a slew of area blues veterans who have returned on the scene with new bands that sound better than ever. Some of those WMUA blues jockeys from the old days have also popped up on the local airwaves and Sheehan's has even revived their "Blue Monday" again. The blues are making a resurgence in the Valley and this coming week is the best time to check out some of the action.

The week kicks off on Saturday night at Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton with the Wildcat O'Halloran Band. You might recognize Wildcat O'Halloran as the friendly wiseguy behind the counter of the restaurant he owns and operates in Sunderland called the Dove's Nest. Not only does he cook up a great breakfast, but he can also cook up some great blues. "The Wildcat" is one of this area's best blues guitarists. Take my word for it. I don't know where he has been for the past two years, winning softball tournaments I suppose, but it is damn good to see Wildcat O'Halloran and his band back at Sheehan's again.

On Sunday evenings you can tune into former WMUA blues jockeys Blue Bill and "Jukebox John" Hayman on WRNX 100.9 FM in Amherst. Where have you guys been? This is blues programming at it's best. Blue Bill and his partner Black Bart start things off at 6:00 p.m and keep the blues rolling until 9:00 pm. Enter Jukebox John and his program "Night Train" which continues the blues block until midnight. Six whole hours of the blues every Sunday night on WRNX! Now if they can only bring back Ellen Millermack.

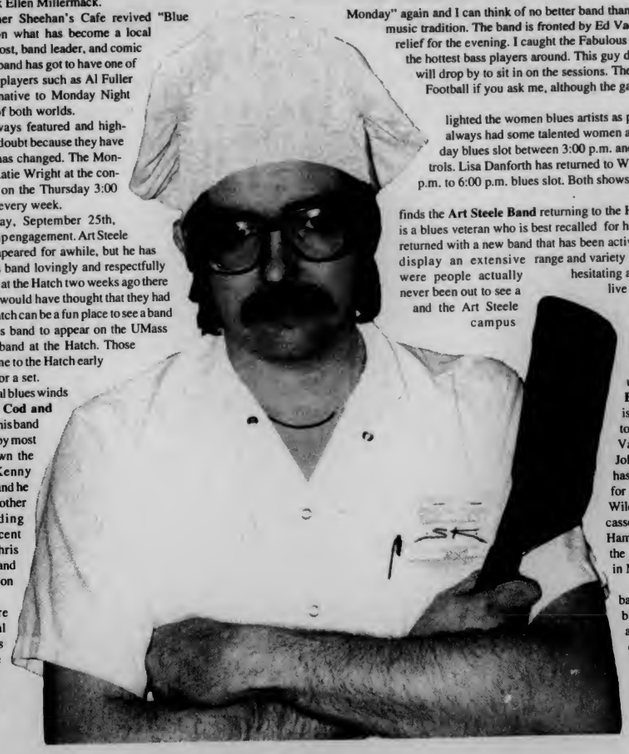
Over the summer Sheehan's Cafe revived "Blue Monday" again and I can think of no better band than the Fabulous Heavyweights to carry on what has become a local music tradition. The band is fronted by Ed Vadas, a local legend himself, who serves as the host, band leader, and comic relief for the evening. I caught the Fabulous Heavyweights a couple of weeks ago and this band has got to have one of the hottest bass players around. This guy does solos all over the fret board. Often guest players such as Al Fuller will drop by to sit in on the sessions. The night starts early and it's free. A great alternative to Monday Night Football if you ask me, although the game is on behind the bar if you want the best of both worlds.

WMUA has always featured and highlighted the women blues artists as part of the their programming and that is no doubt because they have always had some talented women at the helm of their blues shows. Not much has changed. The Monday blues slot between 3:00 p.m. and 6:00 p.m. now features WHMP alumnus Katie Wright at the controls. Lisa Danforth has returned to WMUA from hiatus and she can now be found on the Thursday 3:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m. blues slot. Both shows are excellent and well worth tuning in to every week.

Next Wednesday, September 25th, finds the Art Steele Band returning to the Hatch in the UMass Student Union for a follow up engagement. Art Steele is a blues veteran who is best recalled for his old band Evening Pro Bluesica. Art dissapeared for awhile, but he has returned with a new band that has been actively tearing up the local gig circuit. Art and his band lovingly and respectfully display an extensive range and variety of blues forms. When I saw the Art Steele band at the Hatch two weeks ago there were people actually hesitating about paying a two dollar cover charge. You would have thought that they had never been out to see a live band before. Wake up everybody! The Hatch can be a fun place to see a band and the Art Steele Band is without a doubt the best local blues band to appear on the UMass campus this Fall. You do not have to be 21 to see a band at the Hatch. Those musicians who are up on their chops can come to the Hatch early and sign up to sit in with Art and the band for a set.

The week of local blues winds up on Friday, September 27th, with King Cod and the Blues Sharks at Pearl Street in Northampton. This band is fronted by Wally Greany, who is considered by most to be the best blues harmonica player up and down the Valley. Wally was the main harp man for Kenny Johnson's original "Blue Monday" line-up and he has also worked as a sideman at one time or another for almost every blues outfit in the area, including Wildcat O'Halloran. This band is hot! Their recent cassette release received rave reviews from Chris Hamel of the Springfield Union-News. King Cod and the Blues Sharks are rapidly gaining a reputation in New England as a premier blues band.

The blues are back, and it appears as though the slate of local blues shows in both the clubs and on the radio is a healthy and promising sign of the resurgence of the blues scene in the Valley. Support local musicians. Go to these shows and enjoy yourself. Some of the best music happening in New England can be found right here in your backyard.



Rippopotamus a funky, sweaty time

By MELISA CANLI
Collegian Staff

Now that I am 21 and eager to experience the variety of night time entertainment offered in the valley, I decided to go to Pearl Street Friday night. The Shockers were a good warm-up for the band that followed: Rippopotamus. What talent and energy this band exudes! They are a 9-11 member funk band that has been around in its present form since late last winter. The guitarist Dainis Koulenas and drummer Richard Gordon are high school buddies who have played together for at least ten years. Other members of the band are Michael Stevens on vocals, Allyn Martin on bass, Russell Bogartz on trombone, Jerry Marra and Ric Hirsch on sax, and Deeb and Joan Jubet on trumpet. An extra percussionist and record scratching D.J. often join them.

This band will make you move to the rhythm that you've never felt before. Some rap, hard rock, a little head banging. The chemistry they share is overwhelming. Every member seemed to have as much fun performing as the audience had dancing up a storm.

Saxaphone player Ric Hirsch commented that the band had really developed a following and had started to perform regularly in Hartford, Boston, and New York City while playing as many as four gigs over the weekend in the valley. "It is a very realistic expectation that the band will be signed by a record company before the year is out," he said. Rippopotamus has just released its second album R-House which is available at local record stores. Original song titles include "My Nike Air," "New World Order," and "Alphabet Gumbo" as well as an interesting Led Zepplin tribute.

A WOCH on the wild side

By WENDY BECK
Collegian Correspondent

Nearly four years ago, a 10-watt "pirate" radio station in Orchard Hill was shut down by the Federal Communications Commission for failure to comply with its licensing regulations. Now, seven semesters and five executive boards later WOCH is finally broadcasting again — this time on the Housing Services Cable Network.

When Housing Services was laying the cable for the campus-wide system months ago, Mitch Fillmore, a WOCH alum made certain that 'OCH's cables were laid right along side those of the television system's, thus enabling the station to be hooked into the system and received at every University cable outlet, both in the dorms and in offices on campus.

Although most of the current members of WOCH don't remember the station as it used to be, they are all enthusiastic about being on the air and having radio shows (a fact generally attributed to the station's liberal programming philosophy).

"Above all, WOCH does not believe in censorship. Every D.J. on our station has the right and privilege to play or say whatever they want on the air," stated Chris Willey, this year's D.J. representative. "We are a non-commercial and totally independent of the approval or disapproval of merchant sponsors. We would hope that our D.J.'s would not intentionally offend anyone, but if listeners have complaints about program content, we will ask them to direct them to the specific D.J. involved."

Assistant General Manager Trebor Carey added, "We're not saying that we're going to be an X-rated station, just that we are idealists: we want expression without persecution."

WOCH has already begun making itself known: an alternative-music dance held last weekend in Orchard

Prescription: Spin Doctors

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Staff

Tonight, at the Pearl St. Night Club in Northampton, the Spin Doctors of New York City will perform for our listening pleasure. This funk-rock ensemble was spawned in the New School of Jazz, the same birthplace of the quickly rising rockers Blues Traveler. The two bands go back together, sharing gigs, jamming, and using the hip Wetlands club of lower Manhattan as home base. The virtuoso harp-blower/leader of Blues Traveler, John Popper, even sessioned on the Doctor's just released studio album "Pocket Full of Kryptonite". So does that mean these guys are good, just 'cause they hang with Blues Traveler? No, but they are anyway.

Bart's Back

NEW YORK (AP) — In tonight's season opener on Fox's "The Simpson's, "Homer Simpson asks little Lisa to fill out a psychological profile form his company demands of him. He's no good at those things, he says.

Only if you listen to my poem, she replies. He then hears this: "I had a cat named Snowball. She died. She died. Mom said she was sleeping. She lied. She lied. Why oh why is my cat dead? Couldn't that Chrysler hit me instead?"

Stuff like this cheers you up and makes you realize that there is some good in this world.

It also takes your mind off rumors that Michael Jackson is a guest voice in this first episode. A Fox spokeswoman says she can't comment, having been sworn to secrecy. But gee, a voice in this show sure sounds like His Weirdness.

No matter that it's attached to a truly ugly 300-pound white man in a mental institution. No matter that the man says he's Michael Jackson. Or that he teaches Homer to do the Moonwalk. Or that both are in a mental institution at the time.

It's fine, silly stuff, and gets Matt Groening gently satirical cartoon shots at Life in America nicely under way for its third season.

You'll be happy to know that Homer's extended-tooth family is just as flat weird as ever. His wife, Marge, still has a towering blue 'do. Lisa, now approaching age 8, still plays very good tenor sax. Maggie the baby still commits pacifier abuse. But No. 1 son Bart now is achieving things.

He has discovered exciting new 900 numbers on cereal-for-kids packages, and calls to hear recordings of Krusty the Clown saying: "If you haven't asked your parents' permission, naughty, naughty. But Krusty forgives you. Two dollars for the first minute. 50 cents for each additional minute."

Homer still loves to watch TV and roar at an "America's Funniest Home Videos" rip-off as it shows "man breaking hip." But he does seem kind of somber watching the final segment, called "baby with a nail gun."

"Awww," he says as he hears a soft thump indicating baby did wrong.

The real woes occur when Bart fills out his father's psychological profile form. It gets Homer committed to a mental institution, diagnosed as suffering from "a persecution complex, extreme paranoia and bladder hostility."

It is there that he meets a 300 pound Michael Jackson.

All this is a little complex, but is due to an accident in which Homer's white shirt comes out pink in the wash. Pink makes the evil boss at the nuclear power plant snarl that employee Simpson is a "free-thinking

New album by Billy Bragg one of year's best

By ERIC POULIN
Collegian Correspondent

Don't Try This at Home
Billy Bragg
Elektra Records

Yes, music lovers, as bizarre as it may seem to believe, Use Your Illusion was not the only new album to hit the stores on Tuesday. The much anticipated new release by Britain's lovable socialist, Billy Bragg was also unleashed on that day, and his diehard supporters will discover it to be yet another fine piece from one of the hardest-working performers in the entire music industry.

Not that Bragg didn't have plenty of help from friends in high places on this effort; Don't Try This at Home features guest appearances by Johnny Marr (of Smiths and Electronic fame), Kirsty MacColl (who has worked with the Pogues and now enjoys much solo success), and also Peter Buck and Michael Stipe of R.E.M. They hook up with Bragg's usual cast of characters (i.e. — Cara Tivey, Wiggy, etc.) to produce a 16-track creation that is excellent when matched up with the majority of albums on the market, but seems just slightly inferior when compared to prior Bragg works.

Side one certainly opens with a kick, as "Accident Waiting to Happen" ranks among Bragg's most rockin' tracks to this day. A glimpse between the lines seems to show that this song is in reference to our quite capable (not) Vice President J. D. Quayle, but I'll choose to let my fellow listeners interpret the tune any way that they desire.

"Moving the Goalposts" follows, and is one of the many tunes that seem to bear a striking resemblance to "St. Swithin's Day". "Everywhere" is the first musical indication that Bragg has been hanging out with the members of R.E.M. during the past two years. The addition of Buck's mandolin makes "Everywhere" sound like it belongs on Green more than this album, although the lyrics are unmistakenly Billy Bragg. I don't think the boys from Athens would ever address issues like the oppression that Asian Americans faced during the Second World War.

The side closes with two more soccer-oriented songs. "God's Footballer" tells the story of a soccer star who also works for the church, knowing that his spiritual life is more important and will outlast his sporting career. "The Few" rakes the patriotic extremists and bigoted attitudes that contribute to the riots that are all-too-often an occurence at British soccer matches.

Side two opens with the album's single and outstanding track, "Sexuality." It's a look at relationships in the 1990's from a Billy Bragg point of view ("Safe sex doesn't mean no sex, it just means use your imagination"). The video, which has been seen on MTV's 120 Minutes, features Marr and MacColl, and brings back memories of "Waiting for the Great Leap Forward" — both have videos and are the centerpieces of their respective albums.

Things slow down quite a bit with "Mother of the Bride" "Tank Park Salute", and "Dolphins", which are good songs individually, but collectively seem to bring the album down No Bragg album would be complete without some slow love songs, (see "The Price I Pay", "Must I Paint You a Picture" "The Short Answer", "St. Swithin's Day", etc.), but you may need to take a pulse reading after these three.

"North Sea Bubble" brings us back with a bang, inspired by the writings of 18th century revolutionary Thomas Paine. Oddly enough, this was originally a slow song, as anyone who attended his performance at Smith College in 1989 can attest to. Two years can bring about a world of change, however, as it is one of the most "punked-up" tunes on the album."

"Body of Water" closes the album, and seems to address Bragg's reluctance to enter the mainstream. Many feared that this album would be his sell-out, and this song seems to say, "Don't worry, it won't happen" to all of his fans. It ends the album on an unmistakenly positive note, and left this critic with a Cheshire Cat grin.

So, to all Socialists: take heart! Our hero is back with a vengeance, packing one of the best albums of 1991. And at the bargain price of $8 for 16 songs, I thought that I was committing a felony. It's no masterpiece, but at that price, Don't Try This at Home is most definitely worth a listen.

■ WOCH

Hill drew over two hundred attendees, and the station intends to continue the tradition on the 28th of September with another anti-mainstream dance to be held in the Bluewall Coffee Shop.

Other activities including coffee-houses and live music will be held as the semester progresses.

To hear WOCH, affectionately dubbed "Naked Radio" by this year's executive board, some sort of cable connection is necessary. WOCH is broadcasting as background music on HSCN's television channel 13, and can also be found at 98.1 on stereo tuners hooked to the wall-mounted cable box found in all dorm rooms.

If you would like to have both T.V. and radio hooked up to your cable box at the same time, however, it is necessary to have an FM band separator. Separators will be given out free to the first 100 people to arrive at the dance on the 28th.

As a new radio station, WOCH is actively recruiting new members, D.J.'s, and local bands who would be interested in performing on-the-air or having their demos played and publicized. There will be a general meeting Thursday, September 19th at 7:30 p.m. for new and old members in the Grayson classroom.

■ Spin Doctors

Though they are certainly riding the wave of funk that has risen over the last few years, the Spin Doctors are no cheap-imitation Chili Peppers. Funk is definitely the key to the Doctor's sound as bassist Mark White pops and slaps his way into the hearts of little funksters everywhere. Smoking lead guitar by Eric Schenkman races through the long dancey grooves that provide a live experience of rarely equalled enthusiasm and energy.

These four boys have built up a reputation among afficionados of live rock (a la Phish, Blues Traveller, Widespread Panic) as must-sees. Catchy original songs such as "Big Fat Funky Booty" sear with soulful vocals and grooves that would put the Amherst Nursing Home into shake-your-thang fever. In addition to the new studio album they just released, they have a live E.P. called "Up for Grabs", which amply demonstrates their energy and talent. Both albums are on Epic records.

If your looking for lush orchestrations, or maybe just a sweet love song or two, stay at home and drink Sanka from a lead mug 'till you pull a Caligula, get hip and want to crawl into a Marshall stack for the rest of your life. Or if you've already done this and are now afflicted with a funky rash that has to be itched with excessive shaking of the booty, then you will be well scratched at Pearl St. tonight.

The Spin Doctors will perform at Pearl Street tonight at 8:30 p.m. in an 18+ show.

Women's Issues

A Resource for Women

Entering a large university like UMass can be very overwhelming. Students are often unaware of the vast number of resources available to them.

Although the budget cuts have had a serious affect on the number of opportunities for students here at UMass, many organizations continue to do their best to help them. One such organization is the Everywoman's Center.

The Everywoman's Center performs many services for campus women. They offer advising and counseling and they also have an educational program. The 24-hour hot line number for victims/survivors of sexual violence and battering is 545-0800.

The Everywoman's Center is located on the 2nd floor of Wilder Hall, University of Massachusettes. The center is open Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays 9 a.m. through 4 p.m. and Wednesdays 12 noon through 4 p.m.

The Everywoman's Center Counseling Program has walk-in/drop-in hours Monday and Thursday 12 p.m. through 1:30 p.m. and call-in hours Monday, tuesday, and Thursday 10 a.m. through 11 a.m. and Wednesday 2 p.m. through 3 p.m. Counseling for individuals and couples is available by appointment. Support groups and workshops are offered on a variety of topics.

The Everywoman's Center Counseling Program services are free of charge. For more information call 545-0883.

The Everywoman's Center Counseling Program will be offering a free ten week support group for women entitled "Making Peace With Food." Space in this support group is limited so an interview is required for acceptance into the group. The group will meet on Tuesday evenings from 7:00-8:30p.m. beginning Oct. 8. For more information call 545-0883.

Necessities/Necesidades good Recourse for Battered Women

Necessities/Necesidades, a Northampton-based organization that provides resources for battered women and their children, has been awarded a 1991 IOLTA grant of 35,411 from the Massachusetts Bar Foundation to support their program of legal advocacy for battered women.

The funds will be used to support the salaries of the direct service coordinators who supervise the training of volunteer legal advocates, coordinate the services provided to battered women, and provide direct legal advocacy to women during peer counseling sessions, court appearances and on the hotline.

The funds will also support the salary of an attorney who will be available 12 hours per week for short-term legal representation of battered women free of charge. The attorney will also conduct question and answer sessions for battered women and the paid and volunteer staff of Necessities/Necesidades.

Battered women can contact Necessities/Necesidades twenty-four hours a day at (413) 586-5066.

In the last 18 months, the state has cut 16% of their budget and more cuts are pending. The program needs women to volunteer in order for N/N to continue to provide a road to freedom for battered women and their children.

If you are a woman with fundraising or administrative/office skills or have an interest in providing crisis intervention, support, and legal advocacy, consider becoming an administrative and/or direct service advocate at Necessities/Necesidades. Bilingual and/or bicultural women strongly encouraged to apply.

The next training session, which will be ASL interpreted, begins October 17. For more information call Sandy at 586-1125, or write to Necessities/Necesidades 16 Armory Street, Northampton Mass. 01060.

A Women's Issues editor's manifesto

Greetings Umass! My name is Jessame Hannus and I am the new Women's Issues editor. I worked on the Ed/Op page last semester, so please give me time to get used to editing a news page.

In the past the Women's Issues page has failed to live up to the expectations of both the community and the Collegian staff. I hope to change this.

I am greatly interested in hearing your opinions. If you can think of something that you would like to see on this page, let me know. Also, if you think that I have not adequately addressed your own issues as a woman, please tell me. I cannot presume to claim that I represent all women. We all have different perspectives and agendas. My goal is to address as many of them as possible. However, I will need your input.

I would also like to speak to anyone who has an interest in writing. The Collegian is a valuable source of writing and journalistic experience. I want everyone to have the opportunity to see their name in print. Perhaps you will even discover that you might enjoy journalism as a career. If you think you might like to try writing, please come in and talk to me.

Even if you do not want to write articles, your writing will be greatly appreciated at the editorial desk. If something happens to you, or you see something that might not fit the guidelines of journalistic writing, please feel free to write about it in editorial or letter form.

Our ability to communicate could change the world. The Collegian has given us the space and the opportunity. Let's use it!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Important understandings can be reached today. Take the helm in financing and charting your future. Social affairs capture your interest later in the day. High ideals are essential.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Although friendships are subjects to stress today, there is a positive trend where job and domestic tasks are concerned. Do not let outsiders place limits on what you do. Be yourself.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Contact with friends could change a favorite fantasy into reality. An unfamiliar or faraway locale provides you with fun experiences. You warm to a newcomer. A healthy sense of humor is vital.
CANCER (June 21-July 22): This is not the time to act like a recluse. Be communicative — there are far-reaching plans to discuss and long distances to bridge. Put your best foot forward.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Take no notice of fancy promises or idle threats. Keep your financial dealings strictly aboveboard. Your reputation is on the line. Fulfilling a commitment to your loved ones will bring inner peace.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Cultivate new professional and social contact. "Great minds think alike," as you will soon discover. Long-range plans are taking shape. An old friend will brighten your evening.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You can gain the information and friendly support you desire. An unexpected message delights you. Cross over into new territory and you will like the view. Romance intensifies.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov22Dec.21): The spotlight is on wishes linked to friendship, a legal settlement or domestic arrangements. You can expect a smooth smart and fantastic finish. An old friend gives you a helping hand.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Work and household tasks can be wrapped up swiftly today. Do what must be done before seeking recreation. Acting on an investment tip or snatching up a bargain will pay big dividends.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): If you have been burning the candle at both ends lately, slow down. Do not dissipate your remaining energy; enjoy the comforts of home this coming weekend. Travel can wait.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Terrific, surprising developments occur today. A long-range goal moves within reach. You finally realize who is in your corner. Do not be shy where your aims are concerned.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You have better control of a financial situation now. Direct your attention toward positive people and promising work projects. The sea of love could be choppy. Do not rock the boat.

As for this week's match-up, all that you can question is that the spread is only 11 points. The Pats have only scored 6 points in their last two games. Although Houston was inconsistent last year on the road, I can't see anyone falling asleep against New England. Look for the Oilers to light it up before they go into their open date.

Critics are having a field day in New York as the Giants' offense slumped for the third week in a row. This problem will not be solved in one week. Coach Ray Handley is still trying to get a feel for the team's overall character as was seen by last week's play calling. The Giants looked a lot more like last year's playoff team, but they are still a long way away.

The match-up of the two running games and struggling offenses of the Browns and Giants should provide a low scoring game. The Giants should win this one easily, but not by 12 1/2 points.

Dallas was too distraught over their tough loss to the Redskins to even bother showing up to Texas Stadium to face the Eagles last Sunday. You can be sure that coach Jimmy Johnson was not pleased by the performance of the Cowboys in their 24-0 loss to Philadelphia.

The Cardinals, however, proved that the first two weeks of the season was nothing but a fluke as they were handed their shorts in a 34-0 defeat to the Redskins. Look for the Cowboys to unleash their wrath on Phoenix this week and blow away the Cardinals. This is a must win situation for Dallas if they plan to make a stand in the rough and tough NFC East.

The best pick of the week is definitely the Redskins by four over the stagnant Bengals. Cincinnati is 0-3 and has only scored 34 points in their first three games. Meanwhile, Washington looks to be in mid-season form and should have no problem covering only four points.

The worst game of the week has got to be the the Colts against the Lions. One more loss for Indianapolis and you can say "good bye" to coach Ron Meyer. The combination of an 0-3 start, a whopping 13 points of offense and a loss to the Patriots speaks for itself. Detroit looked good in an upset of the Miami Dolphins last week and should have no problems handling the Colts

This week's Monday Night match-up has the Jets in Chicago against the Bears. Last week the Jets got lucky and still lost to the Bills, while the Bears looked great against the Giants. The Bear running game will be too much for the Jets to handle but it's going to be hard to cover the 8 1/2 points. How did the Jets make Monday Night Football anyway?

Here are this week's picks in CAPS: (H) = Home Team

OILERS(-11) VS (H)Pats, BROWNS(+12 1/2) VS (H)Giants, RAIDERS(-2) VS (H)Falcons, REDSKINS(-4) VS (H)Bengals, (H)EAGLES(-3) VS Steelers, (H)DOLPHINS(-8 1/2) VS Packers, VIKINGS(+3) VS (H)Saints, LIONS(EVEN) VS (H)Colts, BILLS(-8) VS (H)Tampa Bay, (H)49ERS(-8 1/2) VS Rams, (H)CHIEFS(-7 1/2) VS Seattle, (H)BRONCOS(-8 1/2) VS Chargers, DALLAS(+1) VS (H)Cardinals, (H)BEARS(-8 1/2) VS Jets would be a strong favorite over the Sox as well, they're no dynasty. This has been a turn-around year for them, all the way around from a last place finish last season. They've yet to really prove that their current chemistry is for real, though veterans Kirby Puckett and Kent Hrbek, both members of the 1987 World Championship team, are still key components to their success.

It's not going to be easy for the Sox, but after breaking the bank to sign Matt Young and Danny Darwin last off-season (WHY? WHY? WHY?), this is the challenge they deserve to face. No more backing into titles. It's time for a change.

Who does Bonnie Lindros, mother of hockey phenom Eric Lindros, think she is?

"Do you know what's another option? Baseball. Eric could play baseball," she said.

This is the brilliant suggestion by Mrs. Lindros. OK, Bonnie, Eric may have a point by not signing with the Quebec Nordiques (read: poor excuse for an NHL hockey team), but baseball?

Bonnie herself adds, "He's never played much baseball, but he's going to take it up. He took batting practice with the Blue Jays this season."

Yeah, and Bill Murray took BP with the Chicago Cubs, and while these days he might be good for a million bucks a year, he'll make more on the Silver Screen. Bonnie, do you think Ericcan just "take up" baseball and play professionally? The man (or should I say kid, he's only 18) is a hockey player. While it makes sense to discuss options to Eric's playing for the Nordiques, baseball is not a viable one.

The quotes provided here are from a story by Leigh Montville entitled "Young Gun," in the September 23 issue of Sports Illustrated. Here's another one from Bonnie:

"[Quebec's] not the environment we want for him."

Like that matters? Where was Eric's opinion on the subject? While his parents can make all the silly excuses they want for why he won't sign with Quebec, could Eric please come out and say he just doesn't want to play for the team that has finished dead last the past two seasons?

Quebec's a beautiful place. You can't knock it. Thousands of tourists flock there every year. While the language could be a problem (most of Quebec's population is French-speaking), many of the Nordiques speak English, and they are the people he'll be dealing with the most. They're not complaining about the awkwardness of living there, and no one else on the team is making half of what Lindros would. Besides, you give me $3 million a year, and I'll strap on the skates and play for Czechoslovakia.

Eric Lindros is young, but he is the one who must make the tough decisions. I just can't believe that the real reason he won't play for Quebec is the environment. Especially if that's the opinion coming from his parents, not directly from him. He is not obligated to play for the Nordiques, but if others can, he can. While he'll make an impact wherever he'll play, it would be no more noticeable anywhere but Le Colisee. Where else would he feel he's making more of a contribution? With his Junior Hockey team, the Oshawa Generals? Sure, they might be a good team, but they're not in the NHL, and they won't make him rich.

And if Eric's ever really alienated about the thought of living in a French-speaking province, think of how Mats Sundin, one of Quebec's players, feels: he's Finnish (is there a translator for this guy up there?).

Salisbury leads unbeaten field hockey over Providence

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey freight train was on course and at full speed yesterday, defeating Providence College 3-0.

The Minutewomen, ranked No. 2 in the nation, executed their game plan to near perfection from the start, and stopped the Friars from ever opening up their offense. Sophomore Jenn Salisbury notched a hat trick, scoring all three goals in the first half.

UMass kept their perfect record intact with the win and raised their record to 5-0. The team put Providence away with 1:27 left in the first half when Salisbury, off a pass from Tara Jelley, shot the ball in for her third goal of the game.

Coach Pam Hixon attributed the victory to a well-designed, well-executed game plan. Hixon praised both Salisbury and Jelley for their roles.

"Tara really made some great runs for those long balls...Jenny had to play two roles: she had to come back to midfield as well as be up on the forward line," Hixon said. "She really read her responsibilities extremely well. Those two kids did a great job."

UMass started attacking with a fast break offense, hoping to catch Providence off guard. They broke the ice at 24:47 of the first half when Salisbury pounded in the pass from Dawn Trumbauer past goaltender Debbie Haggie.

That goal turned out to be the only one UMass needed, but they increased the lead to 2-0 at 9:45 when Salisbury blasted the ball in on an assist by Sherlan Cabralis.

"We kept pounding the ball into their end, and they made mistakes. Their goalkeeper made some crucial errors, and we capitalized," Hixon said.

The Minutewomen dominated Providence in the first half, as they kept the ball in the offensive zone for the last 27 minutes of the half. The few times that Providence did get the ball into UMass' zone, strong clearing shots by the defense thwarted the Friars attack.

"That's why we scout," Hixon said. "You hope that your ideas work; we wanted to hit the ball into the open spaces, and let Tara Jelley run to the ball."

Nursing a big lead in the second half, the Minutewomen calmed their offensive attack, and made sure that they got back on defense.

"We wanted to stay in control, because they have a tendency to come back and score," Salisbury said.

"I think I saw the ball better today than in previous games, but there is still room for improvement. Our team's just gonna' get better. In the future we need to execute in each game. I think we played hard," said Jelley.

UMass goalie Philippa Scott had another quiet, yet solid game. She played very steadily, and was not caught out of position once. Scott had her third shutout of the season, and lowered her goals against average to 0.4 per game.

The defense performed well, as they only gave up four penalty corners to the Friars. Providence gave UMass 20 penalty corners, and one penalty shot.

So how good is this team, anyway?

Said Jelley, "I think right now that we're mentally strong and physically in shape."

developed a meaningful friendship.

"If you have a proper relationship with your SID, there are things you tell him that you don't even tell your wife," Reid said. "That's just the way it is."

In what is becoming a legendary story, Reid went to visit Davis during the SID's hospitalization one night last summer at about 11 p.m. Wearing a shirt and tie, Reid was stopped and asked what he was doing in the hospital at that hour.

"I mumbled something and then said 'Dr. Reid,' (I went right in)," recalls Reid. "Howie was shocked to see me."

That's the type of thing that friends do for friends and for Reid and Davis the bond is strong.

"If you win the game or if you lose the game, it doesn't matter with him," says Reid. "It goes beyond that, he'll ask how you're doing. He's just a great man. We're around a great one, sometimes we don't realize how great."

The praise for Davis runs all through the athletic program.

"Howie Davis is efficient," says women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien. "Sometimes I wonder how he gets everything done, from the schedule card to the media guide."

Not so coincidentally, long time sports reporter for the Hampshire Gazette, Milt Cole also chose the word "efficient," when describing Davis.

"He always does a good job of providing the information needed," says Cole, a 22-year veteran of the Gazette. "He runs a very efficient press box and press room."

While Cole adds that Davis can be "abrasive," he's quick to rank him in the top five of all SIDs that he has worked with.

"He's a very strong SID, he knows what the media wants and he gives it to us," Cole said. "He's quite accessible."

Media and coaches aside, perhaps the biggest fan of Howie Davis, is the man that Davis calls his "Guru," the SID and Assistant Athletic Director at Northeastern, Jack Grinold.

"Of the thousands of SIDs that there are in the United States, I consider Howie one of my closest friends," says Grinold, who is in his 30th year at Northeastern. "I doubt whether many of the people at UMass know of Howie's reputation outside of the community, he's one of the better SIDs in the country."

Davis's nationwide stature is clearly evident in the fact that he is a member of the CoSIDA (College Sports Information Directors of America) Hall of Fame, an honor which Davis attributes to "longevity," and one that Grinold says is a tribute to the hard work and dedication of Davis.

After a two year stint at Kenyon College in Ohio, Davis took the job as SID at Springfield College, where he met Grinold in 1968. He spent 12 years at Springfield and landed in Amherst in 1980. The Guru and his student have forged a relationship that continues to grow and the kind words from Grinold are seemingly endless.

Massachusetts Sports Information Director Howie Davis takes a break from his busy schedule. Davis has made the UMass SID office one of the finest in nation despite major budget cuts.

"Howie Davis is concerned," says Grinold. "Concerned for UMass, concerned for the athletes, concerned for his family and concerned for the welfare of the college."

Flattered by the Guru's praise, Davis remains humble.

"What makes a great SID? As long as we service the media and service it in a way that the institution dictates, the media can't complain," says Davis, who adds that he not only follows the UMass philosophy, but agrees with it as well.

Davis admits that a university can be run without an athletic program, but the benefits from a sports program are innumerable.

"The extracurricular activities make more well-rounded students," explains Davis. "It is as important as any other part of extracurricular life."

Whether or not Davis agrees with the administration is a moot point, when the reality of budget cuts have forced some innovative measures on his part.

Witness the elimination of the food in the press box previously offered to members of the media, which many had become accustomed to in recent years.

"We're the only school in the country on our level of football or basketball that doesn't offer the media food at games," Davis said.

Some people were aggravated according to Davis, but in his eyes it was a matter of "hot dogs vs. the paper for statistics."

In addition, Davis has cut back on the amount of photographs that are published in media guides, which he says is a major budgetary savings.

Put aside the talk of money, sports and press releases and Howie Davis is foremost a student of life and all that it encompasses. The dates he remembers are associated with UMass sporting events, but the memories are more real and painful than any game could ever be.

"We've had a couple of tough years," Davis says referring to his wife, Rae and his two children Jeri (a graduate of UMass) and Steve (currently a UMass student and tennis team member).

In 1988 Rae was diagnosed with breast cancer, then during the Lehigh game in 1989 Davis received a call that his mother had passed away and finally in August of last year, Davis was told he needed reconstructive heart surgery.

To say the least, the past few years have been trying for Davis and his family.

"If you have what I call a PMA, positive mental attitude, you can get through anything," says Davis.

Rae has been "clean" (in remission) for some time now, says Davis who was with the football team in Virginia on his first day back from surgery, and then followed the basketball team to Indiana to round out his return to work.

The experiences undoubtedly placed things in a better perspective for Davis and he now says he is making the move from a "Type A personality to a Type AB personality!" Still, Davis describes himself as "intense."

"I try not to let anything get by, cover all the bases and try to do what's right," he says. "To accomplish that you have to be intense."

Sox still in pennant race

While only the extinct Brooklyn Dodgers rival the Red Sox in World Series futility, the Olde Towne Team is at least pretty good at winning the American League Eastern Division. However, if they are to win their fourth crown in six seasons, they will have to do so in a different manner: they must come from behind.

Ted Kottler

The Red Sox last three A.L. East crowns came in 1986, 1988 and 1990. In each of these seasons, they were in first place on September 19. In '86, they ran away with the division. In '88 and '90, they narrowly came out on top, but in none of the three seasons were they forced to overcome another team. Yesterday, the Red Sox were two and a half games behind the front-running Toronto Blue Jays, and they have 17 games to surpass the Blue Jays.

I guess its time to try something new. Backing into the title in '88, by virtue of a last day loss by their closest opponent, didn't exactly propel the Sox into the A.L. Championship Series (they were swept by the Oakland Athletics, 4 games to 0). Taking the '90 crown with a meager 88-74 record yielded the same result. Though they have yet to win the division this year, that might be a blessing in disguise. The Sox will really have to get their act together to eclipse Toronto, and if they manage to, they will certainly have some momentum (a rare element among the Sox this season) to carry them into the ALCS, where they would likely face the Minnesota Twins, whose magic number is down to 10.

Facing the Twins would also be more favorable to the Sox than facing the A's (but let's not think that far ahead). Though they fell apart in the World Series last year, the A's began to form a dynasty in 1988. They were such heavy favorites over Boston in the '88 and '90 ALCS that hardly anyone believed the Sox could take a game from the A's (and they didn't). But while the Twins

Roy's view of the NFL

Last week's Monday night game featured two of the premier teams in the AFC, the Houston Oilers and the Kansas City Chiefs. In what was a close battle until the end, the Oilers showed that they will be serious contenders to the AFC champion Buffalo Bills.

Roy Alexander

The Oilers, who are better known for their explosive offense, showed once again that they have a tenacious defense. Houston has outscored the Raiders, Bengals and Chiefs 94-31. In the meantime they have upped their record to 3-0, which may have clinched the Central title. Last year, the Bengals won the division with a mediocre 9-7 record.

Haywood Jeffiries showed the Chiefs and the rest of the league that he too is a bona-fide Pro Bowl receiver. Many critics attribute much of Jeffiries' success to fellow receivers Drew Hill and Ernest Givins. Jeffiries proved everyone wrong on Monday night by picking apart possibly the best secondary in the league.

Despite losing to the Steelers 20-6 last Sunday, the Patriots looked very impressive. Thanks to two early turnovers, the Pats hung close until late in the fourth quarter. Pittsburgh pulled away on a 32-yard pass to tight end Eric Green and a recovery of a blocked punt in the end zone.

You have to seriously question coach McPherson's third down pass selection when it was obvious that there wouldn't be enough room to get off a punt if(when) the pass fell incomplete. As a result, Pat punter Brian Wagner punted the ball into the dairy-aire of teammate Eugene "The Hitting Machine" Lockhart. Otherwise, Coach Mac did an incredible job.

O'Brien to boost enrollment

Recruiting seeks to increase University's revenues

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

In a striking policy change, Chancellor Richard O'Brien has set a goal to increase the undergraduate enrollment of the University of Massachusetts by 3,000 students over the next three years.

O'Brien's plan contrasts sharply to the policy of saving money through downsizing the University, a major point of former Chancellor Joseph Duffey, who has since left for the presidency of American University in Washington, D.C.

O'Brien has set an ambitious goal of increasing the enrollment from the present 17,000 to 20,000 in three years. The Office of Institutional Research and Planning has documented a projected 5 percent undergraduate enrollment decrease in the 1988-91 fall semesters.

O'Brien said the University could realize $9.3 million in addition revenue if the plan works. He said the per capita expenses of Housing Services and the dining commons would also fall with more students on campus.

"With the exception of Harvard and MIT, we are the most prestigious university in this state," he said. "And we have modest tuition. We could invade their market, so to speak."

O'Brien said the University's reputation within the state still remains high even in the face of years of negative publicity over the University's budget. He said this year's freshman class size was nearly the same as that of past years.

"Perhaps we exaggerated our fears of the impact of the budget cuts," O'Brien said.

Timm Rinehart, director of undergraduate admissions, said he will now be able to fill the six empty desks in his office. Armed with a revitilized admissions program, Rinehart said he will spearhead an effort to boost the University's sagging enrollment.

Rinehart will tell prospective students "that this is still a first-rate university" despite the recent slew of budget slashes. "We think we have done a good job in protecting the academic experience."

To attract more students, Rinehart said he will improve the direct-mail program, hold more college fairs, urge more high-school seniors to visit UMass firsthand and use alumni to host visiting students.

But, Rinehart warned, "there is no single key" to attracting more students to the University.

In addition, Rinehart said, the University will boost enrollment by automatically accepting students to this campus from community colleges throughout the state. Those interested must comply with the University's academic criteria.

The more students the University attracts, Rinehart

Student vote a question mark in senate election

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

As the Sept. 24 election to fill John Olver's vacated state senate seat draws nearer, both parties in the contest are unsure about the impact of the student vote.

According to Town Clerk Cornelia Como, 39 percent of registered Amherst voters participated in the primary elections on Aug. 27. In the precincts, which are largely UMass students, the voter turnout was close to that level despite the fact that the election was held during the summer.

Precinct 3, which contains most of Northeast and Sylvan residence areas, showed best with 35 percent voting. Precinct 9, which contains the southern portion of Central residence area, was next with a 34 percent turnout, and Southwest-South had a showing of 31 percent.

The worst voter turnout for UMass related districts was precinct 10, with 24 percent. These students included Southwest-North and a majority of the University's sororities and fraternities.

Como suggested the high student turnout was due to a post-card campaign by Democratic candidate Stan Rosenberg to attract absentee voters. Of the 4226 total ballots for the primary, nearly 550 were absentees.

While there were Amherst community members included, Como said "a good part were students."

Among students from Amherst College, Hampshire College, and UMass, Como estimated there are 2500 regular voters.

Initially, Republican candidate Douglas Dagarin said he was unsure as to the student impact on the upcoming election.

"I'd like to think that the student population holds the same values that this candidacy is promoting. In that respect it is very significant," he said.

Dagarin went on to say the students could make a "big difference."

"Stan is obviously well-liked in Amherst," he said.

According to the campaign staff of Stan Rosenberg, the student vote may not leave a huge impact.

Campaign Manager Ken Bazinet said, "The question is, 'Do the students know?'"

"Stan is a champion in Massachusetts for public higher education," he said, but added the early date of this election could leave many students out of touch with the political environment.

Bazinet went on to discuss a few factors which may take students out of significance. These included the lack of registration drives this early in the semester, the continued assimilation to college life by new students, and the point that a bulk of the campaigning has been concentrated over the summer, when students are out of town.

Another problem affecting student voting, according to the town clerk, is the updating of voter lists. Lists of spring semester students must be reviewed to eliminate those who have moved away and those who have moved to a new location in Amherst.

Those who leave insufficient forwarding information are sent "drop notices" to their last known address, informing them of their unfavorable voting status.

If students are unsure about their positions, they may call the town clerk's office, according to Como.

In this Hampshire/Franklin County election, residents from many surrounding towns will be involved. These include Amherst, Deerfield, Granby, Greenfield, Hadley, Leverett, Montague, Northampton, and Sunderland.

Polls are open on Tuesday from 7 A.M. to 8 P.M.

Hooks: Blacks terrorized by 'Whiteness'

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

She walked into Amherst College's Stearn Auditorium to face a crowd hushed with anticipation. Her message: "Blacks are terrorized everyday by 'whiteness.'"

Bell Hooks, renowned Black feminist author, said she is examining how "Blacks see Whites as the other" in her new book, Black Looks.

She said most traditional Black theorists concentrate on how Whites view Blacks as the 'other,' but she wanted to explore the Black concept of "whiteness."

Hooks said Blacks carry an internalized awareness of Whites as oppressors, which permeates their daily consciousness.

One example was a personal story about visiting a mall and being aware she was the only Black in a White crowd.

Hooks said issues of safety filled her mind, and actually prevented her from using the restroom in the mall because she felt vulnerable.

Blacks are very aware of "safe space" and the idea of "traveling" often holds many terrors for Blacks because it means leaving safe neighborhoods and communities, Hooks said.

Hooks added that Whites assume Blacks share their view of whiteness as something positive and Black as something negative. She said her book "is about how violated Black people feel when we are forced to consume this (message)."

Dem. lawmakers say council 'slanted'

Accuse Weld of snubbing western Massachusetts

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Democratic lawmakers, pointing to the eastern slant of the state's Higher Education Coordinating Council, accused Gov. William Weld on Thursday of ignoring western Massachusetts's education needs.

Rep. Daniel Bosley. D-Adams, said Bay Staters living west of Worcester were "a little fed up" with Weld's attitude toward them.

"In the past three weeks the governor has spent three times more time in the Far East than he has in the last nine months in western Massachusetts," Bosley said, referring to Weld's trade mission to Asia last month.

Bosley's comments came at a hearing of the Legislature's Education Committee, which took no action on the bill.

Ray Howell, Weld's press secretary, accused Bosley of grandstanding.

"My guess is that the representative's comments reflect partisan politics rather than any regional concerns," Howell said. "The governor has spent as much time in western Massachusetts as any other region in the state."

"We don't really have a position on adding two more members to the board. That's fine with us," said Howell. "We're sympathetic to the view that western Massachusetts should be represented and we are working toward that end."

What Weld did object to, Howell said, was "creating quotas of any sort."

We do not think it's a good idea to start dividing the board up along geographic or any other lines," he said.

The Coordinating Council members were sworn in on Tuesday. The council replaced the Board of Regents of Higher Education under a higher education reorganization law Weld signed last month.

Howell said the members' terms were staggered, and Education Secretary Piedad Robertson and Weld were "hopeful (they) can use some upcoming vacancies to bring western Massachusetts representation to the board."

The education reorganization also combined the state's public universities into an expanded University of Massachusetts system and gave its board of trustees autonomy.

Howell said that after the consolidation of the University of Massachusetts, the Amherst campus "wields considerable influence" in the state's higher education system.

Bosley and Rep. Stanley Rosenberg, D-Amherst, are sponsoring a bill that would expand the board from 10 members to 12, and stipulate that two members be from Hampshire, Berkshire, Franklin, or Hampden counties.

Earlier this year Bosley lost a fight with the Weld administration for a 6-cents-a-gallon milk tax he said would help dairy farmers in rural western Massachusetts.

Rosenberg, the Democratic nominee for the state Senate

Oil fires take toll on Kuwaiti reserves

Kuwait City (AP) — Fires set by Iraqi troops during their occupation of Kuwait have destroyed at least 3 billion barrels of the emirate's reserves, the oil minister was quoted as saying yesterday.

Hamoud al-Rouba also said he expected the remaining 282 burning oil wells to be extinguished earlier than the projected date of next March.

He made his remarks during a visit Wednesday to the Um-Qadir oil field south of Kuwait City, where Kuwaiti firefighters were extinguishing a well. His remarks were carried by local papers.

Rouba was quoted as saying that out of Kuwait's pre-war 100 billion barrels in recoverable oil reserves, at least 3 percent had been destroyed.

"The question is how much of the 100 billion barrels we will be able to recover," he said. "A study is needed to determine that. But there is no doubt that the reservoirs have been affected."

He said that the losses of the oil sector since Iraq's Aug. 2, 1990 invasion have totaled $75 billion, including $43 billion in lost oil.

Iraqi troops sabotaged and set fire to 732 of the emirate's oil wells before they were forced out last February by U.S.-led forces, ending a seven month occupation.

The Kuwait Petroleum Co. is conducting a study to determine the feasibility of installing safety valves on the oil wells in order to reduce future damage, Rouba said.

He said Kuwait was estimated before the war to have 100 billion barrels of recoverable reserves, out of a total of 200 billion. Western estimates before the war put Kuwait's recoverable reserves at 94.5 barrels.

Tuition monies will be used to pay workers

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will be forced to draw approximately one-fourth of this year's estimated tuition receipts to pay the salaries of its state-funded employees due to state budget difficulties.

Of the estimated $16.5 million in tuition receipts, $4 million is expected to be used to pay the salaries of UMass employees this year, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page said yesterday.

"Before we got into tuition retention, there were two categories for salaries — state appropriated funds and non-appropriated funds such as grants and trust funds," Page said. "Now, there's a third category — salaries from tuition retention."

The UMass payroll for employees funded by the state is $116 million, necessitating the drawing of $4 million from the tuition pool.

Page noted that UMass "was not earmarking what employees are on tuition retention."

The use of tuition retention funds comes in the context of sharply falling state allocations for public higher education. The UMass-Amherst budget has dropped from $167 million in fiscal year 1988 to $112 million for the 1992 fiscal year. This campus drew $128 million in state allocations for the 1991 fiscal year, which ended on June 30.

Due to the decline in state allocations for higher education, UMass employees have not received a pay raise in three years.

"We feel there is a need for salary adjustment," Page said. "First, we need a commitment from the state on funding on this institution."

Page pointed to the fact that while the University is now drawing $4 million for salaries, even a modest cost-of-living increase would force the University to search for other sources of revenue.

"If [the money] could come from the state, that's all well and good," Page said. "If not, it will come from where the resources are — the students."

Scientists alter gene; discover cause of skin disorder

By DANIEL Q. HANEY
Associated Press

BOSTON — Scientists say they have for the first time discovered a normal gene, altered it and then found the cause of a mysterious human illness.

The technique, called reverse genetis, is the opposite of the way scientists ordinarily search for defective genes that underlie many disorders, especially those passed through families.

Typically, scientists start with a disease and try to find the gene that causes it.

In their backward approach, the researchers found that errors in genes that make a common protein called keratin are to blame for a rare skin disorder called epidermolysis bullosa simplex.

"A scientist is always reluctant to say they were the first to do anything, but I am fairly certain it's the first case" of discovering the cause of a disease this way, said Dr. Elaine Fuchs of the University of Chicago's Howard Hughes Medical Institute.

A report on her work was published in Friday's issue of the journal Cell.

"It was quite amazing," Dr. Howard Green of Harvard Medical School said of Fuchs discovery. "It was very obscure what the problem really was."

Fuchs said her work eventually could lead to a cure for the disease, which makes the skin blister after mild contact. It is currently untreatable and affects one in 50,000 people.

Fuchs' research began with the discovery in the mid-1980s of a group of genes responsible for making keratin in skin cells. Keratin forms strands that make up about 85 percent of the total protein in the skin.

Despite its abundance, scientists have been uncertain what keratin does, since skin cells do not need the strands to grow. However, the new work suggests that it forms the scaffolding that gives skin cells their mechanical structure.

"Once we isolated and characterized these genes, we wondered if there might be genetic skin diseases that have as their basis defects in keratin genes," Fuchs said.

To find out, they created a mutant form of a keratin gene. Then, they inserted it into skin cells in a test tube. The mixed-up gene interfered with the cells' keratin production.

Next, they inserted copies of the mutant genes into mouse embryos. To the scientists surprise, the mice came down with a blistering skin disease that looked just like epidermolysis bullosa simplex, or EBS.

So the scientists isolated keratin genes from two people with a severe form of the disease called EBS Dowling-Meara. They found a single error in the code of their genes.

Finally, the scientists put copies of genes with precisely the same malfunction into skin cells in another round of test tube experiments. The cells grew to look like those from people with the disease.

Though it is still years away, Fuchs said the discovery might lead to a way of using genetic engineering to correct the disease. She speculated that doctors might insert a correct version of the defective gene into patients' skin cells. These cells would then multiply in test tubes and be used to make skin grafts.

Cambodia revisited

Film portrays plight of Khmer refugees

By MATT GRIFFING
Collegian Correspondent

While many may know the story of the unprecedented genocide of the Cambodian people in their country, few may know of the continuing struggles of Cambodian refugees.

A new documentary film titled Rebuilding the Temple, premiering last night at Smith College, seeks to portray a more accurate portrait of the plight of the Cambodian people than more popular films such as the Killing Fields. The film was followed by a panel who discussed issues raised by the film.

Boreth Sun, a bilingual schoolteacher from Northampton who has a part in the documentary, said that the Killing Fields had a "fairy-tale ending" while Cambodian refugees continue to suffer and die.

By contrast, Rebuilding "didn't gloss over important distinctions of Cambodians as they struggle to find a place in America," said UMass Asian Studies Professor Lucy Nguyen. Who plans to use the film in her class.

Professor Peter Rose, a sociology professor at Smith, noted the extremely different orientation that many Cambodian refugees have in contrast to mainstream American culture.

"America's newest immigrants, like all newcomers, come as strangers who must adjust to American culture and experience the generational clash which comes with it," Rose said.

The film portrays how the first generation of immigrants from Cambodia had their Buddhist culture interrupted by Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge.

The Khmer Rouge, a communist guerilla group, took advantage of a war-weakened Cambodian government and attempted to "destroy every vestige of Cambodian life to create a new civilization," a character in the film said.

The unique Cambodian Buddhism originating from India and China provided and continues to provide Cambodians with power to transcend earthly suffering, according to the film.

She gives as an example the movie "Witness," which contains a scene where a little White Amish boy is hiding in a bathroom from a Black man, played by Danny Glover.

"Here we have this scene, with a little fair-headed White boy with rosy cheeks cringing in terror as this giant Black hand reaches over the door for him," Hooks said

Hooks said because Blacks are "simply invisible" to White people, they assume they are equally invisible to Blacks. According to Hooks, this is why White women can't understand the hatred that exists between themselves and Black women.

"Black women wake up in the morning and feel bombarded with white images," Hooks said. "Whiteness is a terrorizing imposition onto Black consciousness."

Hooks said the reason so few Whites shift their position from the White supremacist mainstream is because when Whites "shift their location" and become anti-racist, "suddenly the world becomes less fun. The movies aren't innocent anymore once a critical awareness is reached."

Hooks said both races must engage in critical thinking about "whiteness" and begin the process of deconstruction to remove it as a terrorizing force in Black consciousness.

said, the more money the University will have to hire more faculty.

"The notion is that we can be a stronger University" if UMass raises its enrollment, Rinehart said.

David Lenson, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, worries about an increased workload for professors already suffering from pay cuts and overcrowded lecture halls.

Lenson does not see the immediate connection between attracting more students and hiring more faculty. "The faculty reaction is where are we ever going to get the personnel to [teach the increased amount of students]."

He attributes O'Brien's new plan to the pressure the University faces in light of reduced enrollment in an atmosphere of hard economic times.

In nearly three years, Lenson said, no new faculty have been hired. And during that same period, the University has lost 170 faculty, he said.

Housing Services director Joseph Zannini said a sudden increase in the amount of students at the University would be absorbed into the residence halls without needing to build a new hall. Zannini said the chances of the University being forced to build new housing are "rather remote.

Common sense could have prevented deadly house fire

The wail of the siren pierced our ears as the fire engine sped by the donut shop. Tears filled her eyes as she stared out the window.

On February 17, 1991, a fire ripped through 284 North Pleasant Street. UMass student Jay Pirog was sleeping when the fire ripped through the two-story white colonial and took his life and the life of Matthew Peterson of Framingham. Jay was from Arlington, my hometown and where I went to school with his sister Michelle.

I saw Michelle this summer for the first time since her brother's death. To hear her talk about Jay, and to see the pain she was going through really broke my heart. As she showed us her different pictures of Jay, the deep love and admiration she had for her brother was obvious. I could see that Michelle was having a really tough time trying to cope with Jay's death.

Last night, Michelle called and asked if I could send her some articles from the Collegian about Jay and the fire. She wanted to read them because she had heard that "people had written really nice things about Jay." Michelle wanted to find the names of these people so she could thank them.

After I found the articles, I really didn't want to send them to her. I felt really depressed after I read them. But after a while, I started to feel angry. Angry at the fact that these tragic deaths may have been prevented.

Apparently, another resident of the house, Ben Vernadakis, has asked their landlord three times to install fire detectors in their home. Ben said that "Our landlord was too cheap to put in a fire detector. He said that if we wanted one, we should pay for it."

Amy Prendergast

The landlord sounds like a really nice guy. I wonder how he's feeling today? Was it too much trouble for him to protect the lives of his tenants? I mean come on, they weren't asking him to install a jacuzzi in every bathroom. Maybe they wanted to feel safe at night when they went to sleep — was it too much to ask? I guess it was. Michelle told me they never heard from the landlord after the fire. "He never even called my mother to say he was sorry," she said.

But it gets better. You see, last year the Amherst Town Meeting adopted a Massachusetts General Law that requires all residential area to be furnished with smoke detectors. But for some idiotic reason, after the law was adopted the landlords were given a year to install them. A year? Would it really take an entire 365 days to install a couple of these things?

Unfortunately, like with so many other tragedies, it is too late to ponder over these questions. Two young lives have been tragically cut short. For good.

Everytime I walk uptown past the white house, I get a sinking feeling in my stomach. I look up at the charred roof and stare into the windows, at the blackened matresses that can be seen from the sidewalk. I think about Michelle and I say a prayer for Jay.

I hope after reading this column, everyone decides to check out their smoke detectors in their apartment or home. If they're not working, see if you can replace them. Don't wait around for some landlord to get off his butt, like the one who owns the two-story colonial.

And if you live in the dorms, I wouldn't worry. Last semester I lived in John Adams and took an ear-deafening walk down 21 flights of stairs just about every weekend. At 3 a.m., of course. Trust me, they work.

Housing policies making on-campus life miserable

Most of the recent housing fiasco in Brett involving the "Cultural diversity" floor has centered on the poor homosexuals, and how shocking and scary it must be to be paired with a "straight" person in a dorm room. As usual, this fine paper chose only to give one side of the story, and I must now take it into my own hands to present the flip side.

I was told a story by a heterosexual who had the unfortunate luck to be placed on the cultural diversity floor at Brett. His first scene of dorm life involved his homosexual roommate unpacking homosexual paraphenilia in the room, with the man's "lover" present.

Michael Morrissey

Obviously, it would not be regarded as homophobia if someone in this situation was a little shocked. Regrettably, there are a number of heterosexuals on the diversity floor this year, people who did not sign up for the floor specifically, were not told by Housing that they were assigned a room with someone whose sexual orientation was opposite theirs, and were not even informed by their R.D. that they were on the diversity floor.

To sum it all up, Housing sucks. There are many problems with this most pious administrative branch, and the homosexual-heterosexual situation is just the most embarrassing. Young men and women coming to school have enough anxiety as it is without being stuck in a floor that Housing specifically segregated for diversity, i.e. different sexual orientations. Others talk about the anxiety of gays, but what of these people's anxiety? They did not sign up for the floor, and in most cases don't want to be there. Yet some will have you believe that only heterosexuals harass. Wrong!

Housing should, like most other University's housing administrations do, include a little thing like sexual orientation next to smoker or non-smoker on the housing forms that new students have to fill out. And they should never place someone in a special floor that the person did not sign up for. If the have to, they at least owe the person or people the opportunity to know in advance.

Another case of this involves another special floor that the University offers in Central. It seems Housing placed someone on a floor that they were kicked off the year before. They didn't want to be there and were forced out by the floor's residents. Where are Housing's brains? Don't they check anything?

Well, in case you didn't know, inventories in some residence halls were not done this year (surprise, surprise). Now Housing wants us to fill out our own! The people in charge probably don't want to enter the rooms themselves lest they see how decrepit the rooms actually are.

I am lucky. My room is habitable. The only problem is, because my window lacks a screen, my room is habitable for 20 different types of flies, bugs, and other assorted winged creatures. The biggest animal entering through my screenless room last year was a bluebird, but he didn't stay long (he had to fly!).

A few of my friends are not as lucky. They have large holes in their walls and ceilings, ants and fruit flies, walls that haven't been painted in years, terrible flourescent lights, and furniture missing. Last year, someone left a melted condom on the inside of a drawer for a friend of mine.

There are other complaints also. For instance, the "wonderful" phone system. A joke. First of all, it was delayed by a year. Secondly, it restricts students purposely in two ways: A) Students are unable to make any 900 number phone calls from the university. I guess we're too irresponsible to handle a 900 number. I may be reaching here, but I think I'm competant enough to call the Sports Illustrated Hotline, wait for the Blue Jays-Mariners final score, and hang up. Geez, a guy can really run up a bill doing that.

B) The Housing phone system restricts us by not allowing us to use our phones if our account is unpaid or over the credit limit. I know of an international student who occasionally runs up a bill calling home across the Atlantic, and his girlfriend in South America, yet the system doesn't allow for such exceptions.

UMass cable is a disgrace. Everybody's so happy they have more than one channel now, but think about it. WFSB Hartford channel 3 is one of the only channels I get on my television when I unhook my cable, and it isn't on the cable system. No big deal, right? It's only a CBS affiliate. I'll just do something else on Sunday afternoons instead of watching football.

Besides the fact that cable arrived on this campus a year and a half behind schedule, and that it lacks CNN, ESPN, MTV, HBO, or any cable-only channel, I have only one big problem: if they show the movie, "Silkwood" one more time on Channel 7, I'm afraid I'll go nuts. I can't wait until I'm a junior, and I can really decide where I want to live.

SGA needs you to affect change

As this academic year begins, a feeling of change is apparent. New buildings are being constructed and roads are being repaired. We will miss those all-too-familiar potholes. Well, much of the same repair work is happening here at 420 Student Union — the Undergraduate Student Government Association (SGA) office. For the new students, the SGA has had a torrid past filled with large "potholes" and infighting over whether the politically "left" or "right" will win the battle of Robert's Rules of Order.

However, things are changing for the better. The administration and the SGA are working to fill the largest of the potholes, their poor relationship based on mistrust. The administration has announced that they want to better their relationship with students (as stated in the Collegian on 9/12). But there is a small problem that exists. The "roadwork" cannot get started until we have a team of students that can lead the way. We need people who want UMass to be better than it is. If you are a new student, do not be afraid to take that step forward. You can be the one to make the difference. If you are a returning student and you think the Senate is a joke, them do something about it. Stop the punchline.

The opportunity now exists for the difference to me made. The SGA is holding elections on Oct. 1 for the Undergraduate Senate. Nomination papers can be taken out in the SGA office and are due back by 5 p.m. on Tuesday, Sept. 24 in the Senate office. You are only 25 signatures away from starting to make the difference.

Student sees great change in South Africa

Where do you come from?" they ask me. I immediately tell them that I come from Lesotho, an independent country surrounded by South Africa on all sides. In fact this is the only country in the world surrounded by only one country on all sides.

We slowly drift into talking about South Africa on the whole. I have talked to about 20 people by now and I sense that there are some misconceptions about this much talked about country.

It is absolutely true that when Mr. Botha was the president Aparthied was emminent, there was population-segregation, whites only beaches, residential areas etc., but what I want to say my friends is that South Africa has changed. Nearly every politician promises to change the country after he is elected, but after they are elected how many of the promises are really fulfilled? Mr. F.W. DeKlerk was elected and he brought change everyone could see.

Being an Indian myself I was regarded as a colored. During Mr. Botha's reign I was rejected from restaurants, beaches and other public facilities. We once went to a place in Johanessburg which had natural hot water springs. This place was modernized by the authorities into, a heated swimming pool with a 100 meter water slide. As we approached to the ticket counter we became aware of eyes following us. When we did ask for tickets at the counter the lady coolly looked at us and answered "I am sorry but this pool is open for International community only". In other words it was for whites only!

Now the things have indeed changed. I would in fact go as far to say that there is no racism at all. At least not on the surface as it was before. To tell you the truth I went back to the heated pool, where I was once rejected, and swam to my heart's content. It is now a common sight to see a white person carrying your articles to the car in a Mall. After seeing this I really felt that yes, South Africa had changed and they need credit for that.

I honestly feel that such radical changes take place very rarely and when they do people should know about it.

Black's paychecks trail White's

Racial bias still a major issue, Howard professor says

By TIM BOVEE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — College-educated white men earn nearly one-third a year more than black men with similar backgrounds, the Census Bureau said Thursday.

The study, conducted in 1989 and 1990, showed blacks lagging economically behind whites by almost every measure. Higher education moved blacks ahead of less-educated whites, but they still lacked the earning power of whites of equal education.

Black men 25 and older with four years or more on average earned $31,380 in 1989. White men of equal education earned $41,090.

The gap between black and white women age 25 and older was narrower. College-educated black women earned $26, 730: white women, $27,440.

Among people 25 and older with four years of high school but no college, black men earned $20,280; white men, $26,500; black women, $16,440; white women, $16, 910.

Ronald Walters, political science chairman at Howard University, said the study dealt "a devastating blow" to the idea that race is declining in significance in the United States.

"Race as a factor is growing, and racism accounts for, I would think, some of this," Walters said.

As college-educated blacks climb the corporate ladder, many at some point reach the "glass ceiling," an informal barrier to promotion.

Rather than rising, "they languish in jobs that are below their qualifications, or they are siphoned out of the company to a new entry into the black position of another firm," Walters said.

The census survey provided broad confirmation of Labor Department research that found widespread barriers to promotion of minorities and women in nine large corporations.

The Labor Department report, released in August, said much of the bias was unintentional, caused by such practices as word-of-mouth recruiting, lack of access to management development and training and the failure of executives to foster advancement of minorities and women.

Other factors that lessened the value of a college education for blacks include:

— Urban residence. Jobs sought by college-educated blacks have moved from cities where they live to the suburbs, where there are fewer blacks, Walters said.

— Type of company. Claudette Bennett, author of the census report, said college-educated blacks are more likely than whites to work in service industries, where salaries are low.

— Time with a company. Tanya Mann, a research demographer at the Population Reference Bureau, a Washington research group, said college-educated blacks are relative newcomers to the labor market and so have had less time than whites to win promotion and higher pay.

Although the rewards of education were less for blacks than for whites, blacks were more likely to have four years of college in 1990 than 10 years earlier, the census study said. Last year, 16 percent of blacks ages 35 to 44 had completed at least four years of college compared with 8 percent in 1980.

In that age group, 80 percent of blacks had completed four years of high school in 1990 compared with 63 percent in 1980.

But fewer black men just out of high school had enrolled in college — 25 percent in 1988 compared with 26 percent in 1980. Black women were more likely to go to college: 31 percent of recent high-school graduates were enrolled in college in 1988 compared with 29 percent in 1980.

Straitjacket Fits discover abrasive ambiguity with Melt

By E. DOUGLAS BANKS
Collegian Correspondent

Melt
Straitjacket Fits
Arista

Strait Jacket Fits, the four member group hailing from New Zealand, have brought to us their new LP, Melt. Although few of the tracks on this album will be scrambling up the hit single charts any time soon, more than one may bounce around inside your head long after you've turned off the stereo.

Unlike their first album, Hail, which was more shiny, pop-oriented Strait Jacket Fits is seeking ambiguity with Melt, and they find it. They refuse to be put into a nice, easy category. They have an appealing, indie-pop sound that occasionally veers to a darker, macabre side. You won't find any screaming vocals or squealing guitar licks, but you will find some power chord melodies enhanced by unexpected hooks and some vivid disturbances.

Lead singer Shayne Carter identifies their music as "essentially pop music," but admits, "there is an abrasive edge to it."

He also reveals, "I feel confident that if someone came up to me with an interpretation (of a song) they'd be wrong. Mystery is important."

The opening bass line in "Bad Note for a Heart" acts like a welcome mat to the rest of the album. It is an inviting song that kicks off a surreal experience that thrives on the ambiguous. Melt features both harmonious vocals, as in the song "Down in Splendor," as well as the powerful "Headwind," which picks up the pace with some heavier guitars and spirited lyrics.

The third song, "Melt Against Yourself," features bass guitarist David Wood leading a comfortable ride through some surprising progressions.

This album has now real "bad" songs on it. You won't find yourself fast-forwarding a song to get to the next one. However, nothing will reach out to grab you either. But beware, because it will grow on you. As the title warns, once you warm up to it, this album will "melt" on you. And don't try to pigeonhole this New Zealand Group's music because their message is this: "No one has ever found a straitjacket that fits. Straitjackets never do."

Geri Allen brings jazz to Horse

By JAMES MOLESWORTH
Collegian Staff

Geri Allen grew up in Detroit, where she was influenced by the music of Motown, and her bandstand "jam" sessions with Detroit beboppers such as trumpeter Marcus Belgrave. Yet Geri Allen represents the new wave of jazz musicians, not only educated from the impromptu jam session, but also by the formal training of the University. Geri Allen holds a B.A. in Jazz Studies from Howard University, and a Master's degree in Ethnomusicology from the University of Pittsburgh.

The part of Allen's career which has been most documented has been her association with drummer Paul Motian and bassist Charlie Haden. There are several albums available from that trio, and Allen is also an active member of Haden's Liberation Music Orchestra. She is a founding member of Brooklyn's M-BASE collective, a galvanizing force in the Black Rock Coalition, is currently heading her octet "Open On All Sides", and is touring with her own trio.

While representing the new wave of jazz musician, that of the 'twice' educated school, Allen also represents another important wave which is finally reaching the shores of the music world, that of the importance of female musicians. Jazz is no doubt dominated by male players, and most females who have tried to break into the scene have been pigeon-holed into being only vocalists (for instance, unbeknownst to many, Sarah Vaughn was an excellent pianist). Yet thanks to Allen, the boundaries of male dominance are being broken down. She leads the charge of several talented female musicians including the young Canadian pianist Renee Rosnes, and the drummer Cindy Blackman (who could challenge Elvin Jones in the energy department).

In 1982, Allen moved to New York, where fellow Detroiters Pheeroan Aklaff and Dwight Andrews connected her with pianist Anthony Davis, vibist Jay Hoggard, and saxophonist Oliver Lake. She was featured on Lake's Plug It album (on Jump Up records), and through Lake, Allen hooked up with such luminaries as Lester Bowie, Joseph Jarman, Ralph Peterson and Dewey Redman.

Allen's style is certainly distinctive. She can be adventurous without loosing an audience, she can be bluesy and eclectic at the same time, and her solos show an uncanny ability to swing hard, while remaining subtly provocative. She has incorporated a full range of black music into her own voice, from Thelonious Monk and Art Blakey, to James Brown and Jimi Hendrix.

Her current trio consists of Pheeroan Aklaff on drums. Aklaff is a mainstay of the New York village scene, fronts his own group, and can be heard on pianist Yosuke Yamashita's latest album Sakura (on Antilles records). Bassist Anthony Cox rounds out the trio. For her upcoming gig at the Iron Horse, trumpeter Wallace Roney will be making a special appearance. Roney plays regularly with drummer Tony Williams, as well as leading his own group. His latest endeavors can be heard on Obsession, with drummer Cindy Blackman (on Muse records).

Geri Allen will be in concert at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Friday, September 20. The show starts at 7 p.m. and tickets are $12.50 in advance. Call 584-0610 for info.

SO BASICALLY, BOOPSIE IS SAYING SHE BELIEVED YOU VIOLATED HER TRUST. IS THAT HOW YOU SEE IT, B.D.?
WELL... NOT REALLY...
I MEAN, I JUST THINK THERE WERE EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES. THERE WAS A WAR ON, AND WE WERE ON THIS WEIRD CRUISE SHIP...
THE DAY WE BOARDED MEG AND I JUST ROUND OURSELVES IN A SITUATION THAT NEITHER OF US HAD PLANNED ON!
WHAT SORT OF SITUATION?

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): An open exchange of ideas could prove very useful today. You need to let others know that you care. Speak your mind forcefully and confidently. Someone who has been acting difficult comes around.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Knowledge of a special subject serves you well in a difficult situation. Your career is entering a more productive phase. Friends prove better companions than family members now.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Now is an opportune time to ask for a raise. Be conservative when shopping for a new fall wardrobe. Look for the practical as well as the ornamental CANCER(June 21-July 22): The emphasis today is on obtaining reliable information and completing a special project. Your past efforts help you reap new rewards. Maintain a steady pace at work.

LEO(July 23-Aug. 22): Be creative, independent, and direct. Have more confidence in yourself and other people will follow your lead. Reaching out will help a dream become reality. Romance is sublime.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Constructive thinking is essential now. A romantic relationship could cloud your judgement. See things as they really are and you will make the right choices. Reschedule an important meeting.

LIBRA(Sept.23-Oct. 22): Protect your resources by ignoring distrations and focusing on essentials. A member of the opposite sex may try to set you up for a fall. Keep your guard up and trust your instincts

SCORPIO(Oct. 23- Nov. 21): Stay alert. Accounts may be out of balance. A splurge could throw your budget into turmoil. Distant places promise exciting adventures. You discover something new about yourself.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov.22-Dec. 21): You make real headway when you try to improve job or domestic conditions today. Do not let a friend sidetrack you. New duties provide a welcome challenge. Music and dance gain favor.

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A waning relationship could be saved by a generous gesture on your part. Your words of support mean everything to a good friend. Others admire your loyalty. Forge ahead with a pet project.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Lie low for a while and be careful what you say. Sounding critical of someone could cost you money or support. Progress comes in small steps. Be patient and bide your time.

PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): New rapport is possible with people both near and far. A financial agreement will settle a legal battle. Put more effort into romance. Neglecting mate's needs would be a big mistake. Be attentive.

Field hockey has tough weekend

Minutewomen host Rutgers and Lafayette

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The undefeated University of Massachusetts field hockey team, ranked No. 2 in the country, prepare for a big weekend at home against Rutgers University and Lafayette College. They host Rutgers Saturday at noon and Lafayette at 1:00 p.m. on Sunday.

The Week one NCAA field hockey poll came out on Tuesday, and UMass towers over everyone except Old Dominion, who is ranked first in the nation. Coaches gave Old Dominion 120 points, while UMass garnered 114. Maryland, Penn State, and Iowa round out the top five.

The play of the Minutewomen (5-0) has been exceptional, especially in the area of teamwork. Coach Pam Hixon said she is quite happy with the way each player has individually assumed a role of leadership this year. But Hixon is quick to point out that the team is young, and still has a tough road ahead.

"Putting expectations on a young team like this is too much," she said. "We have to take them as they come, every day."

The Minutewomen entered the season in a difficult position: they lost a handful of starters from graduation, and the returning core is very young. And yet, here the team is, on top of the rankings.

"I've had teams whose goal was to make the Final Four, and we couldn't live up to our expectations," said Hixon, promising nothing. "Our goal is to play with the same intensity, every day, in practice and in games."

Rutgers is a team that has been known to bring their own intensity to the field, as well. The Minutewomen play the Lady Knights for their second straight Atlantic-10 conference game at home. Rutgers poses a special kind of challenge, according to Hixon.

"They were in a similar position to us, they graduated six or seven starters... they're a big and strong team, and they practice on grass so they'll be ready for Totman field," she said.

Against Rutgers, UMass expects to keep playing their style. They may find that they have to adjust, Hixon said, as they discover Rutgers' plan.

"We don't know what they're going to do, but I anticipate their team as a combination of Providence and Temple," Hixon said.

Rutgers lone win came against Hofstra, a 1-0 victory on the road. They lost their next two games, 2-0 against Lafayette and 1-0 versus Michigan State. It seems, by this pattern, that Rutgers may have trouble scoring goals.

Their defense is anchored by captain Ellen Masterson, a returning senior. In fact, Rutgers has nine seniors on their roster, including four on defense. Senior goaltender Heather McDevitt will mind the net Saturday for the Lady Knights.

As much as Hixon worries about Rutgers, Sunday's game against Lafayette may prove to be the more difficult match. Lafayette has a record of 3-1, but their lone loss was an 8-0 pulverization at the hands of Old Dominion. They are ranked 15th in the country.

Powering the offense for Lafayette is senior forward Suzi Farell. Farell has two goals and an assist this year. Junior Lori Bamford is second on the team in goals with one. Tending goal will be sophomore Jackie D'Angelo, who has saved 81.4 shots fired at her.

"We've never played them before, but they're up here playing [University of] Connecticut on Saturday, and they wanted to add us to increase the strength of their schedule," Hixon said. "It should be good, competitive experience for both teams. We're both in the same position and neither team will be more rested," she said.

Water polo at Navy for tournament

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

Revenge must be weighing heavily on the mind of UMass water polo coach Russ Yarworth as he leads his team, ranked 17th in the nation, to the U.S. Naval Academy this weekend for the first round of the Eastern League Tournament.

The team's first game will be tomorrow morning against 16th-ranked archrival Iona; the same Iona squad that beat UMass in the championship of the Army Invitational two weeks ago.

"It's a good rivalry, and there are no secrets between us," Yarworth said. "Maybe we have an edge because they have already beaten us and may be looking past us."

Other teams in the tournament are Slippery Rock (PA.), Harvard, Navy, Brown, Princeton, and Bucknell.

If the Army Tournament was an early season see-where-we-are-trip, Yarworth says he now knows the answer. "The real season is now. We have to go and show what we are capable of doing as a team. I think we have really progressed."

Iona beat the Minutemen at Army by forcing them out of their game plan and into taking long shots. Yarworth says the keys this time will be taking closer shots, but not "getting so wrapped up in our offense that we play no team defense. No one player will dominate. We have to play as a team."

Alex Yelansky, Tasan Engin, and Odolfo Oilete must stay close to their two meter line positions for the short, quick shots. Dan McOsker and Scott Reed will also be relied upon heavily.

The trip to Anapolis, Maryland is a trip the team absolutely dreads. Today they will drive the eight hours to the Academy, and scrimmage at 5 p.m. Tomorrow's game with Iona is only the first of three games they play in less than 12 hours.

"We travel this far together so we can play the highest level of competition," Yarworth says.

The field is tough, with all the teams except Princeton and Bucknell ranked in the nation's Top 20, and those two remaining teams are just out of the list.

"I'd like to think we can go there and be one of the top two or three teams," Yarworth said.

A win against Iona would certainly qualify them for that claim, and while it may be secondary to a convincing win, revenge is sweet.

Massachusetts took last years contest 1-0, in Orlando.

"Last year was disappointing," Barker said. "Certainly we weren't happy with the outcome because we felt that we out-played them. This year I expect just as good a game.

"I know Massachusetts like the back of my hand and Rudy knows us the same way. There shouldn't be any surprises, just a good soccer game," Barker added.

"We are going to have to ride out the initial wave of Central Florida's emotion and then play our game," Rudy said. "This will be a high-strung game."

The game takes place Saturday at 12 p.m. on Upper Boyden Field.

Minutemen in search of first win at Maine

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

It's tough to call the third game of any season a must-win game, but that is exactly what Saturday's football game in Maine (1 p.m.) is, for both the University of Massachusetts (0-2) and the University of Maine (0-2).

To put the importance of this game in perspective. . . no team has ever won the Yankee Conference with three conference loses and a loss by either team on Saturday would give them two conference defeats and make winning the Yankee Conference almost impossible especially the way Delaware (2-0, fresh off a 28-21 upset over fourth-ranked William and Mary) is playing.

"If we want to compete for the Yankee Conference championship, we have to consider this a must-win game," said UMass coach Jim Reid.

The Minutemen are reeling. They've lost four straight dating back to last season, the latest, a 22-20 defeat at the hands of Holy Cross. The defense is coming off a week in which they allowed 484 yards of total offense, and the quarterback situation remains fuzzy at best, although Paul Tornatore will start tomorrow.

Maine has two very capable running backs in Carl Smith and Paul Capriotti. The latter rushed for 1,680 yards in 1989, 794 yards last year and is 370 yards shy of Lorenzo Bouler's all-time Maine rushing record of 3,828. In his career against UMass, Smith has rushed for 521 yards on 74 carries (7 yards per rush). The former has already gained 173 yards in the first two games of the season, (128 yards last week against Northeastern).

The Black Bears allowed a two point conversion late in the game against Northeastern and then had a 44-yard field goal fall short as they lost 15-14. The week before they were blown out by Villanova 48-7.

The Minutemen will be without the services of linebacker Mario Perry for the second straight week. Perry sustained an ankle injury in the opener against Delaware. Reid felt that the loss of Perry against Holy Cross was one reason why the defense could not stop Jerome Fuller who rushed for 207 yards and three touchdowns.

Freshman quarterback Emilio Colon was named the Yankee Conference Rookie of the Week last week after his 17-of-31, 153-yard, one touchdown, two interception performance against Northeastern.

Colon's favorite receiver Tony Szydlowski has caught 11 passes for 118 yards and one TD. Capriott has six catches.

UMass running back Jerome Bledsoe did not practice until Wednesday because of a sore ankle. He ran for 131 yards on 25 carries last week. Reid said that if Bledsoe had not practiced Wednesday, John Johnson would have started.

"It's gonna be like every week. . . it's gonna be a tough game," Reid said. "You can take the point spreads and throw them out the window."

Game Notes: The game will be broadcast on WTTT (1430 AM), WGAM (1520 AM) and WMUA (91.1 FM).

Bledsoe working himself back into form

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Those around the University of Massachusetts football team are anxiously awaiting the return of the real Jerome Bledsoe to the gridiron, including Bledsoe himself.

Even though the tailback rushed for 131 yards on 25 attempts in Saturday's 22-20 loss to Holy Cross, Bledsoe and his coaches admit there was still something missing in his game.

"It will come, whatever it is," he said Wednesday. "It's not physical, it's more mental.

"After last week's game, people said to me, 'Jerome, you're doing well,' but everyone who has ever really seen me play knows that there's more that I can do."

Head coach Jim Reid said, "I still don't think we've seen him in top notch form."

The Bledsoe of old was an explosive back until he broke his ankle toward the end of the first half of last year's season opener. The Bledsoe of old came off the bench against Lehigh in 1989 and had 209 yards in only 19 carries with two touchdown runs.

"We really haven't seen him accelerate consistently yet this season," Reid said.

Bledsoe had ankle surgery immediately following the injury and also had arthroscopic surgery this past Spring. He wasn't allowed to run until this past June, seven months after the mishap.

"He was a little bit tentative last week," said offensive backfield coach Jerry Gordon.

"I felt like I had to watch myself," said Bledsoe, who admitted his ankle felt sore at the start of the second half of last week's game.

"Before [the injury] I was running crazy. There was no doubt in my mind as to what I could do. I could do anything."

While in high school, Bledsoe was one of the top running backs in the country and was recruited by Division I college football powerhouses Notre Dame, Michigan and Florida State. However, Bledsoe broke his ankle before the season was over and all the major schools passed over him. He arrived at UMass in 1987.

"Jerome Bledsoe is a Division I back and we're lucky to have him here at UMass," Gordon said.

In the second half Saturday, Bledsoe carried the ball 11 times and compiled 81 yards, an average of 7.3 yards per carry. He also broke a run for 23 yards.

"In the second half, we started to see the old Jerome Bledsoe," Reid said. "He was really working hard. He gave us a little burst that he didn't give us the Saturday before."

Bledsoe also caught four passes Saturday for eight yards, returned five kickoffs for 73 yards and threw an incomplete pass.

"People have to beware when he's in the game," offensive coordinator Doug Berry said. "He's multi-talented and he's got the ability to get it all done."

Gordon said, "We want the ball in Jerome Bledsoe's hands. His strength is his quickness and his moves make people miss. But, he can also be a power back at the same time."

"I play big, not like a small back...and things like this happen," Bledsoe joked as he pointed to his ankle soaking in a tub in the trainer's room.

As to when the real Bledsoe will be back, he said, "I'm getting there, hopefully soon."

Reid said, "I wouldn't be surprised if it happens against Maine."

Women's soccer set to face Central Florida

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

After starting the season with three straight road games the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will square of, at home, this Saturday against Central Florida.

The Lady Knights, ranked No. 15 in the nation, will be the third straight top 20 opponent for the Minutewomen. Massachusetts (2-1) is ranked No. 11.

"This will be a very tough game for us," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "Central Florida hasn't played a real good team yet so I know they will be pumped up for this game."

Central Florida enters this weekend at 3-0, after blowing out three lesser opponents, Mercer, West Florida and Florida Atlantic by a combined score of 26-1.

"We have done well so far, but we know that Massachusetts is our first big test of the year," Central coach Bill Barker said. "Certainly we have to play well this weekend for us to know that we are a good team."

Central will be lead by forward Tiffany Schreiner, who has seven goals already. Teammates Karen Kopp and Kelly Kochevar both have four tallies on the year.

"We have been scoring a lot but I think our defense is our strength," Barker said. "We have been fairly fortunate on offense this season, I don't see us scoring 11 goals against Massachusetts."

The defense will be anchored by freshman goaltender Heather Brann. Brann has played all three games, collecting two shut-outs and 0.33 goals against average. Brann is just one of many new players making a difference on the team this year.

"Central Florida is a very young team," Rudy said. "They lost most of their impact players to graduation but they had a deep bench last year and they had a great year recruiting."

As for Massachusetts they will have to battle an injury plague as well as a strong Central team. Paula Wilkens is still suffering from a sprained ankle she suffered in the opener against Vermont and this week in practice both Kim Eynard and Michele Woodside went down with a sprained ankle and knee, respectively.

"Of the 18 players we have on the roster, 13 have an injury in some form," Rudy said. "This team is beaten up. Wilkens, Eynard and Woodside are all questionable but one thing I like about this team is that they are mentally tough. They have a lot of courage, a lot of inner fortitude and if there is a way they can play they will."

"Massachusetts is a very solid team," Barker said. "Their strengths run right

Men's X-Country hosts three teams on

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team looks to get on the winning track this weekend as they play host to Northeastern, Iona and Brown. The race starts at noon, beginning and ending behind Totman Gymnasium.

In their meeting last year, Iona won the meet with 31 points. UMass finished second with 41 and Northeastern was third with 48. Brown did not compete.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien feels Iona is the heavy favorite to duplicate its victory of a year ago.

"Of the teams returning from the meet last year, UMass loses its top three finishers [to graduation]. . . Northeastern loses its top three. . . and Iona returns everybody, and they finished one-two to begin with," O'Brien said.

Iona was led last year by Mel Hilliard and Packie Mulvaney, who placed first and second in the five mile race with identical times of 25:50.

Although he concedes that Iona may be out of reach for the Minutemen, O'Brien expects his team to battle for the second spot with Northeastern and Brown.

"I'd say Iona will be a little too tough for any of the three teams," he said. "I would expect that Brown, Northeastern and ourselves will put together a pretty good battle."

Although the two teams did not meet in a dual-meet situation last year, O'Brien believes that he has a good idea of Brown's capabilities.

"Brown, I have a fairly good feeling for because last year, during the course of the year, they paralleled our team almost stride for stride in terms of meet results," he said. "They ran courses nearly identical to the way we ran them. . . At the end of the season at the IC4A's, when me met them for the first time, we finished 10th and they were 17th. . . We had a good day and they didn't. I don't think there's that much of a difference."

The top returning UMass harrier from last year's meet is sophomore John Raach. He finished fourth for UMass and 12th overall in a time of 27:02. Junior Matt Simon was the team's top finisher last week against UMass-Lowell and BC, running 26:17 at Franklin Park in Boston.

GEO disturbed by stalled negotiations

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

With nine days left until the contract negotiation deadline set by the Graduate Employee Organization expires, the University of Massachusetts administration will not meet this week with GEO leaders to finalize the union's first contract.

"It is extremely disturbing. We have work to do. It is unfair to be negotiating a contract and not meet with the other side," said Emily Isaacs, the co-speaker of the GEO/District 65/UAW.

Negotiating teams from both sides will conduct a negotiating session the day before the deadline of Oct 1., Isaacs said.

Beginning today, the GEO will hold a week-long program called "Win More at Whitmore" to raise awareness of the contract dispute. The GEO has planned speakers, information tables and other events around the Whitmore Administration Building.

Isaacs said some participating TAs have opted to conduct classes in Whitmore to participate in the events and still teach their classes. "Most TAs are really concerned about not hurting their undergraduate students," Isaacs said.

Seymour Berger, dean of social and behavioral sciences and one of the five members of the administration negotiating team, said he was unable to comment due to an agreement with the GEO not to discuss details concerning the negotiation.

"We're not supposed to discuss what has been going on in the negotiations. We're both under that kind of rule," he said. "I would like the negotiations to go forward in a congenial manner."

In May 1990, the GEO membership voted to obtain four major points on their union contract by Oct. 1. They also voted to take "decisive action" if their demands were not met by that deadline.

Isaacs said these are the four demands of the GEO:

- Health fee. Since graduate employees, such as teaching and research assistants, are state employees who receive "substandard" pay, the GEO does not want to pay the mandatory health fee as compensation for their low pay.
- Agency fee. Like the other unions on campus, the GEO would like to charge non-members a fee. The GEO said they are obligated to raise money this way in order to serve their members.
- Binding arbitration. The GEO would like an outside party to deal with future contract problems or other grievances.
- Job security. The GEO would like to make the reduction of teaching assistants (due to budget cuts) "logical and academic instead of random," Isaacs said.

David Lenson, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said the MSP supports the GEO's demands.

Lenson said most graduate employees are over-burdended with work and low salaries. "Their base salary is a disgrace," he said, noting graduate employees at other universities receive two to three times as much.

Sukkot a celebration of new season, joy

By FELICE COHEN
Collegian Staff

Sukkot, the "festival of our joy," a celebrating the start of a new season for the Jewish culture, began Sunday night on Tishrei, the first Hebrew month of the Jewish year.

University of Massachusetts Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter said Sukkot is a joyous holiday.

"We feel good about the new directions in our lives and rejoice," said Perlmutter. "Since we just finished some serious soul searching during Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur."

There are many symbols in Sukkot, the major one being the sukkah, a wooden structure.

Perlmutter said the sukkah is built to "remind us of the Jews wandering in the desert after leaving Egypt in which they built these temporary huts."

During the seven days of Sukkot, Perlmutter said many Jews live and eat sukkah.

"Some Jews sleep and many eat in their sukkahs," he said.

The sukkah is made out of wood. The top is decorated with either cornstalk or branches that had once been growing from the earth and were then cut off.

The sukkah is also decorated with apples and other fruits, strung cranberries and popcorn and even pictures, said Perlmutter.

"It is a positive thing to decorate [the sukkah] nicely," said Perlmutter, "and to welcome guests into your sukkah."

This is the practice of ushpizin, meaning to welcome on each day a new guest. Jews not only welcome present day guests, such as family and friends, but many ancestoral ones as well, such as Abraham and Issac, Perlmutter said.

Perlmutter described Sukkot as a holiday where Jews are able to get closer to nature. "It gives the same feeling one gets when camping and you can always see a full moon."

Two other very important symbols of Sukkot are the lulav and the etrog. The lulav consists of three branches bounded together; a palm branch, a myrtle branch and a willow branch.

The etrog is a citrus fruit, which resembles a lemon. Jews say blessings over the lulav and the etrog, while shaking them in all directions.

Perlmutter said the reason why Jews rejoice with these particular objects is that they are agricultural symbols and they represent the harvest time.

Simchat Torah, which means "rejoicing with the Torah," is the very last in this series of Jewish holidays and comes seven days after Sukkot begins.

"It commemorates the completing of the five Books of Moses," said Perlmutter. "And we immediately begin again with Genesis."

Perlmutter said that everyone is welcome to come visit the sukkah, which is located in the courtyard of the Hillel House, as well as to bring their lunch and eat in the sukkah.

There is also available in the House a lulav and an etrog and people are welcome to come borrow them to say the blessings.

On Monday, following a 10 a.m. morning service, all are welcomed to a light lunch in the sukkah.

Channel 40 details UMass' fiscal status

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The current fiscal situation at the University of Massachusetts will be highlighted, or perhaps lowlighted, in a panel filmed by a local television station Channel 40, WGGB tonight in Bowker Auditorium.

PREVIEW

The panel, part of a live News 40 Education Forum titled "Dark Days on Campus," will run from 8 p.m. to 9 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall. While the forum is open to all students and faculty, audience members must be seated by 7:45 p.m.

Panel members will include acting UMass Provost Glen Gordon, Mass. Higher Education Council member Paul Marks, UMass Student Government Association President David Gagne, UMass Student Trustee Kevin Newnan, Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editor-in-Chief Gayle Long and the presidents of Westfield State College, Holyoke Community College, Greenfield Community College and Springfield Technical Community College.

On Thursday, Channel 40 reporter Alan Cohn and cameraman Sylvester Berger came to UMass to film scenes from the campus to open the program.

"We're doing a report to [open the program]," Cohn said. "We wanted to give people the state of affairs at UMass."

Cohn said he interviewed Chancellor Richard O'Brien, Gordon, and German Professor Frank Hugus, secretary of the Faculty Senate, as well as students attending classes in Herter Hall on Thursday morning.

"[Channel 40] has a dedication to covering issues that deal with education," Cohn said. "It is a top priority of our station."

Cohn said the format of the panel would be primarily focused on allowing for audience questions and comments.

"Nine Sundays" seeks to replace election hype

Television networks support proposal

By JOHN DIAMOND

WASHINGTON (AP) — A proposal to keep Willie Horton and flag factories out of the next presidential campaign is drawing cautious support from the major television networks.

A product of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, the "Nine Sundays" proposal seeks to replace election hype with substantive comparison of the Democratic and Republican nominees broadcast over nine consecutive Sundays between Labor Day and Election Day.

Columnists and editorial writers praised the plan last month when it was unveiled. But questions remained as to whether the television networks would adopt it. Now a favorable response is beginning to emerge.

"We support the notion of finding ways of learning more about the candidates and what they stand for and Nine Sundays is a proposal that goes to the heart of that issue," said Bill Wheatley, NBC's director of political coverage.

Lane Venardos, executive producer of special events for CBS News, said the proposal got instant attention from network executives and "certainly contains some good ideas." But he added that CBS is considering other options for making its presidential coverage more substantive.

All this discussion arises out of the widespread criticism of the 1988 presidential campaign in which the major networks typically gave two candidates only a few seconds of air time each night on the evening news.

Critics said that truncated coverage and place a premium on shrill, attacking campaign tactics, giving the advantage to the candidate who could come up with the best "visuals" that day.

Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis refused to engage then-Vice President Bush, thus losing an opportunity to attract air time by sparring with his rival. And Dukakis' visual acumen was typified by the disastrous tank ride, a photo opportunity gone bad in which Dukakis appeared silly instead of presidential.

Bush attacked constantly, running a now infamous ad that drew attention to Willie Horton, a convicted murderer released on furlough from a Massachusetts prison. Bush's visit to a flag factory, which produced video showing the candidate awash in red, white and blue, highlighted his knack for the photo opportunity.

Under the Nine Sundays plan, cable and public television stations would make 90 minutes of evening or prime time available every Sunday leading up to the election. One of the three major networks would participate each week.

Two segments would be presidential debates with "no audience, no artificial hoopla and applause, no panel of journalists, one moderator, all to be done in a simple, unadorned TV studio," according to the Barone Center's plan. There also would be a Vice presidential debate and a concluding segment featuring speeches by the two presidential candidates.

Each of the other five programs would focus on a single issue such as abortion, taxes, or U.S.-Soviet relations.

"It's a very intriguing idea," Wheatley said. "I think everyone that was involved in the coverage of the 1988 campaign feels that we could have done a better job that year and is looking for ways to do a really good job in 1992."

All three networks have been in touch with John Ellis, who wrote the proposal,and Marvin Kalb, who heads the Kennedy School's Joan Shorenstein Barone Center on Press, Politics and Public Policy. Some elements of the proposal are already showing up on the air.

CBS has committed to airing relatively lengthy news segments on declared or likely presidential candidates. Last week the network devoted several minutes to a piece on Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, much of which simply showed Clinton speaking at various events.

"It is new and we hope it's the result of lessons learned from past campaigns," Venardos said. 'We all sensed that the art of compression had been polished too finely in 1988 and that allowing people to speak was not a bad idea at all."

CBS may announce other improvements in its 1992 campaign coverage this week, Venardos said.

NBC's Wheatley said a problem with the Nine Sundays plan is that it requires the participation of the candidates as well as the networks.

"None of this can happen if the candidates don't wish it to happen." Wheatley said. "The candidates -particularly whoever's ahead -would not be likely to devote that many appearances on these matters."

Kalb, for 30 years the chief diplomatic correspondent for CBS News, said some political operatives in both parties have expressed interest in the plan.

Service fraternity registers bikes to combat thefts

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

In response to the increase of bicycle thefts at the University of Massachusetts, a fraternity will be registering bicycles free of charge as part of their rush activities.

Alpha Phi Omega, a co-ed service fraternity, will be registering bicycles starting on Monday through Thursday this week. Students can have their bikes registered by the bike racks next to the Student Union from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

UMass Police report that so far this semester, nearly a dozen bikes have been stolen on campus.

The procedure is quick and can easily be done between classes, said Nancy J. Schultz, publicity chairperson for the fraternity. An identification sticker will be placed on each bike, and the owner's Social Security number will be engraved on the frame.

"We wax over the engraved number, so it does not rust," said Julie Casey, service vice president of APO.

In addition to the marking of the bicycles, APO will collect the make, model and serial number, as well as the value and submit the information to the UMass Police Department.

Last spring APO also sponsored their first bike registration but only for a few day, organizers said.

"It went over fairly well," said Casey. "We registered close to 100 bikes."

APO is a national fraternity and is responsible for a number of services on campus. These include the "ride board" in the Student Union, where people with cars seeking passengers to share costs are matched with those in need of a ride.

They also conduct blood drives, an annual Las Vegas night and work with Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts.

Another program, similar to the bike registration, is Operation ID. This involves engraving Social Security numbers on personal property for dorm residents.

APO currently has about 30 active members, and had a pledge class of 15 last semester.

Woman questioned in boy's death; says he died while having sex

METHEUN, Mass. (AP) — A 24-year-old married woman questioned in the death of a teen-age boy says he died while having sex with her.

Jeanne Piccirillo said Shannon Richardson lost consciousness while they were having sex in her car on Aug. 26. She told Richardson's family that she panicked, drove him home and pushed his body into the street at 1 a.m. and left.

Police would not comment on Piccirillo's claim, saying they are awaiting the results of an autopsy from state police. Richardson's mother, Cindy Richardson said she doubts her story.

"I don't understand. I saw him at midnight that night, and then I got a call at 1 a.m. saying he was dead," she said. "I'm very angry with her...she put me and my friends through hell."

The teen-ager's aunt, Gail Julien, said she was equally baffled by Piccirillo's story.

"She said she worked him for 30 minutes with CPR" before giving up and dropping his body off in the street, Julien said.

Piccirillo said she didn't take Richardson to a hospital or inside his home because "I thought I would be blamed for it."

"All I do all day is cry. I figure if they would believe me it will go away. I just want to know how he died," she told the Lawrence Eagle-Tribune.

The youth's boss, William Mancini, owner of Knight 'n' Day Cleaning Service in Lawrence, said if police don't find the answer, he will devote all his business profits to find the truth. "I will hire a private investigator if that's what it takes," he said. "I will not let this go."

Piccirillo met the Richardsons two years ago, after Julien, of Methuen, began working for Piccirillo the Florist in Methuen.

The boy and his mother helped make floral deliveries there during the holidays. Piccirillo, who was not married then, worked behind the counter in the shop. She married David Piccirillo in July 1990.

"He had come to me before and asked my advice" about his affair Piccirillo, Cindy Richardson said. "I said, 'Stay away. She's married. It's a bad situation.' My son was very quiet and shy. She initiated the relationship."

Rosenberg for Senate

Tuesday's special election to fill the State Senate vacancy left by John Olver's election to the U.S. House of Representatives affords the Five College community, as all elections do, a chance to stand up and make their opinions heard. If you are a registered voter in the Amherst/Northampton area, get out and vote. If you're not registered, register for the next election.

Tuesday's contest presents a striking ideological contrast between two polar opposites: State Representitive Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) and Republican Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin. The two make for some interesting comparisons.

Rosenberg's record speaks for itself, especially in the area of education. When public higher education had seemingly no friends on Beacon Hill, Rosenberg was fighting for every penny allocated to the state's 29 colleges and universities, most notably the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. While no candidate should be judged on one issue alone, Rosenberg's service to UMass cannot be overlooked.

Rosenberg also was involved in changing the Proposition 2 1/2 override procedure. Where once a two-thirds majority was necessary, a simple (over 50 percent) majority is now all that's needed for cities and towns to raise property taxes. In an era of decreasing state aid and increasing prices, this is vitally important to communities who need more money for schools, roads and the like.

Dagarin has echoed Gov. William Weld's line regarding the funding of education, calling for privatization and cooperation between the state's businesses and schools in lieu of higher taxes. Essentially what it adds up to is government washing it's hands of responsibility to the public sector. Philanthropy can never replace good government.

Dagarin has made his anti-abortion stance very clear at a time when the very existence of abortion rights is at stake. Rosenberg, however, has stood for a woman's right to choose.

Dagarin's major weakness, however, is his strong anti-homosexual stance. Certainly his opinions are his own business, but Dagarin has chosen to come out declaring himself having a "desire not to see our government condone homosexual behavior."

We feel that no candidate who advocates bigotry of any sort has any place at any level of government. While Dagarin has had the fortitude run on his convictions, those convictions put into practice place him at odds with the most basic civil rights, and certainly in violation of the Massachusetts Gay Civil Rights act.

Stan Rosenberg has three advantages over Douglas Dagarin: a strong command of the needs of education in Massachusetts, experience in government — Dagarin has never held any public office — and a sense of responsibility to his constituents rather than to his own convictions. For these reasons, the Collegian endorses Stan Rosenberg for State Senate.

Weirdos on my telephone

Well, that time of year is once more upon us and yes, I've survived to offend again. I wasn't quite sure I was going to make it after I received a nasty phone call from some lunatic who kept going on and on about what he thought about last week's column (he didn't like it).

After calling me a wide variety of sexual euphemisms, he proceeded to colorfully describe the various orifices in which I could shove it. Being a kind fellow, he even offered to do it for me. I declined, but thanked him for the offer.

Apparently this poor, confused soul was upset because he thought that I was too critical of the intellectual capacity of the average student here at UMass. "We no am stupid," he said.

Jared Blaut

Anyway...

This little column which you are now reading with such unbridled apathy is part two in my two part series on the wonderfully wide variety of people who occupy space at this little institution of ours. I've renamed it "Weirdos on my Telephone" in honor of the aforementioned gentleman. Now without further ado, I present:

Part II: The Social Life of the UMass Student ("Life Being Used in the Most Liberal Sense of the Word)

The average UMass student (or Putzius Majorius) is a close relative of the common leech which, as Webster's New World Dictionary describes, is "a blood-sucking worm living in water."

Of course being somewhat higher up on the evolutionary scale, the leech is able to thrive without the injection of large volumes of harmful alcoholic substances into its bloodstream; a threat which natural selection has not yet been kind enough to bestow upon Putzius Majorius.

The UMass students' dependence on urine-like liquids has some interesting and unusual effect on their behavior. For example, the avid observer of Putzius Majorius might want to take a trip up to Orchard Hill one fine Friday or Saturday night. If he's lucky, he may get a chance to observe what has come to be known around campus as the "Bowl Wars".

During this strange bonding ritual, virtually tens of students stand on the balconies of their respective dorms around a sacred circle of grass and, displaying a complete and total lack of sobriety, throw bowls at each other.

If you really want to have a good time, you can walk down fraternity lane and see how many drunk Greeks fall off their roofs.

If you are a female, strolling down frat lane (I'm told) can be one of the most rewarding experiences of your life. Yes, no matter how homely you may be, you will no doubt be showered with a wide variety of compliments from the multitudes of men lining the sidewalk.

These guys know how to look for those special characteristics in a female (such as having two legs) that lets them know a fine woman when they see one. In addition you will probably receive many kind offers from wasted males who are unselfishly willing to stop whatever they're drinking in order to "spend some time" with you.

Since this is equal-opportunity criticism, allow me to say that a lot of ladies get trashed in a big way as well. You can tell who they are because they are the ones who actually accept the frat boys' offers.

On the other side of the coin is my friend, Tom. Now Tom really enjoys doing Calculus. In fact, Tom spends the vast majority of his waking hours doing Calculus. During what little free time he has, Tom likes to kick back, relax, and do a little Physics.

Tom is starting to lose it, though, because the other night he went down to the pond to feed the ducks. Now, that seems normal enough. But when you consider that Tom did this at midnight and while he was there he decided to scale and then leap from a willow tree wearing a hat made out of branches and then proceeded to run screaming, barefoot through a field with his eyes closed until he hit a tree, you might begin to wonder.

Tom doesn't get out much.

The more mentally aware people out there are now thinking, "Wait a minute. How does that wonderfully witty and insightful writer Jared Blaut know exactly what Tom was doing by the pond? Was he there? Did he participate?"

Judge for yourself...

Them's is fightin' words

I just don't understand this fighting thing.

This isn't the "art of self-defense" kind of fighting that you see on pay-per-view. You don't have to go to Las Vegas or Atlantic City to see it first-hand, either. Indeed, you need not travel farther then your own residence area or apartment complex.

Greg Sukiennik

Anytime between Thursday night and Saturday night, you can bet that somewhere, sometime, someone is going to get the whatnot kicked out of him or her by a some walking societal menace. It won't be for honor, or glory, or some other highfalutin cause. No, it'll go something like this:

"Hey, you spilled beer on me you [expletive]!"

"Sorry dude, but it's only your shirt. Don't have a cow."

"You're a wise-ass, aren't you? I oughta [expletive] you up!"

"You just go ahead and try, tough guy."

"You wanna throw? Come on, you [expletive], I'll knock the [expletive] out of you, you [really gross expletive]!

And so it begins. Two drunk individuals throwing punches at each other over spilled beer. Manhood personified, right?

Last week, two guys in my residence decided they didn't like each other and hey, why not hit each other? Well, that's not the way it worked. There was a definite winner and a definite loser in this bout, and the latter got his face smacked repeatedly, pointblank, until his mouth and nose were gushing blood.

I suppose I could give a more vivid account of this mismatch had I seen it in person. I didn't, and I'm kind of glad for that. Seeing a barroom brawl unfold isn't the same as watching Foreman vs. Holyfield. The action can spill over and include you. It gets scary.

You can see and hear the force and effect of every blow. The blood is very real. There's no referee to step in and stop the action if it gets one-sided, and unless someone big enough can pull the combattants apart, someone could die. Yes, I said die. If you don't believe me, ask someone who boxes or does martial arts and they'll tell you how a blow to the face or head could be potentially fatal.

Did you ever notice how the parties involved in a fight are usually drunk? This phenomenon is called "beer muscles." Five or six pops and suddenly shy little Robbie is Big Bad Bob - or so he thinks. But what happens when Bob starts with that 300 pound guy in the corner who's asking him "Why are you looking at me?"

Call an ambulance. Robbie's been hit in the face with a bottle.

Call a lawyer. The 300 pound guy's in the town pound for assault with a deadly weapon.

Guess Big Bad Bob shouldn't have looked at him, huh?

A friend of mine from Lowell, a "tough town," summed it up this way. He's been in a few scraps in his day, and he's pretty big, but he says "Fights are so stupid." I couldn't agree more.

Owners made sports a business

As I read David Scott's column, "Back Then, When It Was A Game" (September 18), I thought to myself, "So how do you solve this problem?" Mr. Scott, like so many other sports critics, targets the wrong culprits and offers no solutions.

In 1989, Major League Baseball signed (sold) over $1.4 billion worth in television contracts to CBS and ESPN for 1990 through 1994. That's over $53 million per team, over $10 million per year. That's without selling advertising, concessions, admissions, licensed products or, most importantly, independent cable contracts. The Boston Red Sox alone are valued at over $200 million. Suddenly, Roger Clemens' $5.21 million contract seems like peanuts.

It is the greed of the owners that has caused this spiraling of contracts, ticket prices, etc. Were it not for the genius of Marvin Miller, the man who created the [baseball] players' union and ultimately won the institution of free agency, the players would still be at the mercy of the owners.

For example in 1919, the Wrigley family, owners of the Chicago White Sox, offered pitcher Eddie Cicotte a $5,000 bonus if he won 30 games. Guess who sat in the bullpen after victory number 29? It was a business then, it's a business now.

How do you solve this problem? You can only control the greed. The NBA is the prime example. There is a salary cap, controlled ticket pricing, and all television revenue is equally shared. The result? Every team is a money maker, attendance is growing every year, and the average salary is greater than that in baseball. As the great Casey Stengel would say, "You could look it up."

Finally, Mr. Scott writes, "...sports is society's...most addictive drug." I suppose Mr. Scott would say that ancient Greece was the world's largest opium den. The Greeks argued long and hard about the value of sport in society and their influence is still felt today. What are those things held every four years? Olympics, you say?

The simple, incontrovertible fact is that sports is an integral part of our culture, our society and our way of life. And anyone who refuses to believe that will be a sports critic and not a sportswriter.

U.S. not abiding by majority rule

A fascinating piece of news, foreign to perhaps all of you since it went totally unreported in the Free Press, concerns a United Nations General Assembly of 1987. At his time, the "Community of Nations" voted on a series of disarmament resolutions. The resolutions, and accompanying vote tallies, are as follows:

1. Opposition to the buildup of weapons in outer space - 154 to
1, with no abstentions.
2. Opposition to developing new weapons of mass destruction - 135
to 1.
3. In favor of a comprehensive test ban - 143 to 2.
4. In favor of a halt to all nuclear test explosions - 137 to 3.

Joined in two cases by France, and once by Britain, one country alone voted against each proposition. What country could possibly be so belligerent and warlike? Why, our own good ol' U.S. of A.' the staunch, unanswerving defenders of freedom and democracy.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but I thought that a constituent of democracy is majority rule. Each of the four votes demonstrates not only a majority, but an incredibly large one at that. Yet, four years later, none of the resolutions have become a reality. So, either the U.S. government isn't working hard enough to ensure the democracy it purports to defend, or else its citizens are being relentlessly lied to. What do you think?

Correction

The Editorial/Opinion page wishes to apologize for a serious oversight of Collegian policy which ran in Friday's paper.

A column ran in the Editorial/Opinion page in which columnist Michael Morrissey made a reference to a news article written by Trystan Skeigh. It concerned the difficulties in adjusting to living with people of different sexual orientations experienced by both homosexuals and heterosexuals.

However, a remark made by Morrissey about what he termed as "one-sided" treatment of the issue was totally inappropriate. Collegian policy is clear in this regard: staff members are not allowed to respond to the work of other staff members within the paper. The Collegian regrets the error.

Shear brings Noho a lesbian blast from the past

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Staff

Linda Shear
Northampton Center for the Arts
Saturday, Sept. 20

For the first time in over a decade Linda Shear, who rocked lesbian America in 1974 with her landmark album Linda Shear, A Lesbian Portrait, gave an emotion-packed, three-hour, women-only concert at the Center for the Arts in Northampton Saturday night.

Her show was a fund-raiser for F.L.O.W.E.R., a lesbian economic foundation devoted to providing funds for the development of lesbian community and culture.

A significant actor in the 1970s Northampton-based lesbian liberation and separatist movement, Shear's album was the first LP ever released that had "for lesbians only" printed on the cover. Also, in 1971, Shear was a founding member of the first openly lesbian band in the United States, Family of Woman.

For a variety of personal reasons, including financial, Shear gave up her musical career toward the end of the decade and became a certified public accountant in Northampton. Since then, Shear has rarely performed in public, except for a few cameos. For the younger women in the audience, Saturday was their first opportunity to fully experience and appreciate Shear's music.

Shear brings to the stage a uniquely powerful musical lesbian presence. She has a rare and special ability to reach out and embrace her audience, imbuing the packed hall with strong feelings of trust and community. Her lyrics openly, honestly reflect her wide range of experiences and struggles as a lesbian. Several times Shear told her audience that "my music comes from my heart."

At one point Shear commented "the presence of power in this room is so palpable, so tangible, I can feel it. I can't tell you how powerful I feel lesbian community is."

Shear, seated behind a grand piano, opened her concert with "Family of Woman" probably the most popular cut off her LP. Shear said "this song was a tribute to my deep love and respect for women that has only strengthened and deepened over the years."

Shear's packed repertoire included a number of selections off her album, including such favorites as "Let It Be Now", popularly known as the "space ship song", about a lesbian space-craft that comes to take all the lesbians stuck on Earth home, and "Barbara" a somber and deeply compassionate look into lesbian alcoholism. The crowd was obviously delighted with her first public rendition of "Windflower", a love song dedicated to her partner. As the crowd softly aaah-ed in appreciation, Shear handed her lover a rose at the song's conclusion.

Shear's highly developed political/social conscience was an integral part of her performance. Songs were interspersed with periods of political commentary and social insight. By the end of the night Shear had covered a wide array of issues, ranging from lesbian separatism, gay parenting, the Israeli-Palestinian peace movement, alcoholism, cancer, sexism, and homophobia.

At one point, in reference to women's bookstores, Shear pointed out the progress she has observed in lesbian liberation, noting that "I come from a time when a lesbian could own every lesbian book [available], every album, and every opinion. Now, there are so many opinions, so many books, so much music out there..."

Although it may be true that a large variety of lesbian cultural materials now exist, it is a sad fact that Shear's album cannot be found among them. Shear's ground-breaking album was limited-edition and has never been re-issued, making it nearly impossible to obtain.

Saturday night Shear's powerful performance underlined the significant place she holds in lesbian music history and allowed younger members of the lesbian community to experience an artist who has become a cultural legend. Hopefully, we will not have to wait so long for her next performance.

OH, HOW HORRIFIC!
HELLO, I'M KRIS K EARLE. DUE TO SOME COSMIC COLLEGIAN BLUNDER, MY COMIC STRIP TITLE WAS REPLACED WITH BARRY DEUTSCH'S "CAST OF THOUSANDS" AND VICE-VERSA. HOPEFULLY, THIS WILL NEVER HAPPEN AGAIN, BUT IF IT DOES, PLEASE REMEMBER THESE THREE MAIN DISTINCTIONS BETWEEN STRIPS. #1 -- I AM NOT A VERY GOOD DRAWER. BARRY IS. #2 - MY STRIP IS INCREDIBLY HUMOROUS AND MAKES YOU LAUGH UNTIL YOU BUST YOUR SPLEEN. #3 - BARRY'S MAIN CHARACTER IS A RACIST. MY MAIN CHARACTER (KLARK BLACKSTAR) IS AN ALL-AROUND SWELL GUY.
THANK YOU FOR YOUR TIME. READ ON... PEACE, KRIS K. EARLE

Quote of the Day

"No comment."

Dear Campus Community,

Many mistakes were made on the Friday, Sept. 20, comics page.

Of the many mistakes, by far the worst mistake made was the printing of a comic strip that could have been perceived to be pro-racist.

The comic strip was submitted to the managing editor the week before. After reading the strip and talking to several people about its content, the managing editor decided that the strip, while its intent was to satirize racist views, was not clear in its purpose and could be perceived as a pro-racism statement. He then chose not to run the strip. The managing editor then put the strip back in his comics folder so that he could talk to the artist about it later. Every morning, the managing editor takes the comic strips that are to be run for the next day and puts them in the graphics room where the graphics staff puts the strips in the paper. After the managing editor had gone home Thursday, however, the strips that were chosen had somehow been lost. The staff that was on Thursday night then used whatever comic strips they could find in the managing editor's comics folder. Unfortunately, that particular strip was still in the folder and was put into the paper without being read. The night editor on duty that night failed to check the content of the comics page, thus, the strip ended up in the comics page.

Other mistakes included the mismarking of the "Under 21" and "Cast of Thousands" (the questionable strip) comics strips which were attributed to the wrong work and artist.

The Collegian formally apologizes to any offended parties and thanks you for your patience.

It's ugly, but Minutemen beat Maine

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

ORONO, Maine — Another game, another ugly performance, another productive rushing day for Jerome Bledsoe, another quarterback change and a win, one the University of Massachusetts had to have.

It's hard to believe that 9,746 people paid to watch Saturday's football game at Alumni Stadium between UMass and the University of Maine. . . It was that bad.

Jerome Bledsoe carried the entire Minuteman offense on his back and dragged it through Saturday afternoon's Yankee Conference game as UMass improved to 1-2, 1-1 in the conference, beating Maine (0-3, 0-2) 10-3.

Bledsoe rushed for a career high 214 yards on 35 carries, good enough to earn him tri-Offensive Player of the Week honors in the Yankee Conference.

The defense held the Black Bears to 42 yards rushing. Maine's star running back Carl Smith, who had rushed for 574 yards in his two previous outings against UMass, was held to just 11 yards.

In the first quarter, Maine kicker Jeff Mottola missed a 37-yard field goal. The Minutemen marched down to the Maine 16-yard line and Jim Maguire kicked a 33-yard field goal to put UMass ahead 3-0.

On the first play of the drive, Bledsoe carried for 11 yards, five plays later, he rambled 42 yards down to the Maine 13 yard line.

The key play in the sequence was a pass interference penalty against Maine's Bill Curry on a third-and-eight play that gave UMass an automatic first down.

In the second quarter, UMass had a chance to take a 6-0 lead but Tom Fasano fumbled the snap on what would have been a 35-yard field goal attempt. In the fourth quarter, Fasano came in to quarterback the team and completed a third down pass to Lamar Newsome which enabled the Minutemen to run the clock out and preserve the 10-3 win.

Jeff Mottola tied the game in the second quarter with a 41-yard field goal. Quarterback Emilio Colon (15-27, 206 yards and three interceptions) rallied the team, completing three passes for 43 yards in the drive. He was sacked four times on the afternoon and left the game with a wrist injury in the fourth quarter.

With 1:11 to play before the half, UMass linebacker Bobby Burke intercepted a Colon pass. Two plays later, Curry picked off a Paul Tornatore throw at the UMass 42-yard line and Maine was threatening to take the lead before the half.

However, Don Caparotti (eight tackles and some jaring hits) intercepted Colon's pass at the 13-yard line, ending a sloppy half of football.

The way Tornatore played in the first half, completing only 4-of-12 passes, UMass was lucky to be tied.

On UMass' initial possession of the third quarter, Tornatore led the team 57 yards into the end zone. Actually, all he did was handoff to Bledsoe and fullback Mike George (the Yankee Conference Rookie of the Week). Bledsoe carried four times for 21 yards and George got the call the other three plays, gaining 36 yards, the last four of which were for the go-ahead touchdown.

Jim Maguire added the extra point to give UMass a 10-3 lead and the defense did the rest, holding Maine scoreless in the second half.

"All we wanted to do was not have any turnovers and hold them," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "I told the defense that if we don't hold them, then we don't win the game."

The Black Bears best chance to tie the game came early in the fourth quarter when they marched to the UMass 20 yard line before the defense clamped down and forced a Mottola field goal attempt that fell short.

"Defensive games are always ugly," Reid said.

Offensive coordinator Doug Berry said, "We did what we wanted to do, we just didn't score as many points as we'd like to."

The Minutemen played the game without offensive lineman Bill Durkin who is suffering from an internal infection below the waist.

Women's soccer wins

Defeats Central Florida, 2-0

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

In a battle of two nationally ranked teams the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team proved to be the better squad as they defeated the University of Central Florida 2-0, on Saturday.

The 11th ranked Minutewomen dominated play most of the game and then held off a late surge by No. 15 UCF to prevail. Massachusetts got goals from Michele Woodside and Kim Eynard and a strong outing from goalie Briana Scurry to improve to 3-1 on the season.

"This was a real big win for us," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "I don't want to play them later in the season when they gel. They are an explosive team our defense had to absorb their pressure."

In the first half the Minutewomen controlled the play and after numerous scoring opportunities finally scored on Heather Brann. At 23:27 Woodside collected a pass from Eynard at the top of the penalty box and drove a shot into the far corner.

"We've been trying to make the most of our attacks and finish with a shot or a cross and that's what Michele did," Rudy said. "She made a real nice shot."

Massachusetts essentially sealed the game up late in the second half when Paula Wilkens chipped an indirect kick from about 30 yards out to the goal-mouth where Eynard was able to outleap a defender and tip the ball over the netminders head, into the goal.

"It was a cross and I knew that I would be able to flip it over the goalie if I could head it and that's what happened," Eynard said. "It was a great ball by Paula."

Central out shot UMass 14-10, but Scurry was there for the Minutewomen on all attempts. She had 13 saves as she notched her second shutout of the season and lowered her goals against average to 0.50.

"Briana had another very solid game for us, she didn't have any big timers but she was under pressure most of second half," Rudy said. "It is becoming common place for her to play this way.

"[Central] played a real smart game, they came forward and counter-attacked, they have a dangerous attack but our defense just shut them down," Rudy said.

Eynard said, "Any win is a big win for us. We pulled together and beat a good team."

Women harriers drop meet to Springfield

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Correspondent

The injury bug continued to plague the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team, as the they lost to a tough Springfield team 26-30 at Totman Field on Saturday.

On Friday, coach Julie LaFreniere recieved word that Maureen Meldrim, one of the Minutewomen's top runners, has mononucleosis and is quite possibly out for the season.

Also, the Minutewomen were without the services of freshmen Tracy Delutis (hip injury) and Cheryl Lyons (shin splints) as they fell to 1-2 on the season.

LaFreniere did however receive good news when she learned that Kelly Liljeblad, out for the past six weeks with fallen arches, can begin running again on Monday and will, "Hopefully be able to run Saturday at the Dartmouth Invitational," LaFreniere said.

Springfield took the top two spots in Saturday's meet, while UMass took third, fourth, and fifth. However, Springfield took five of the next seven spots, preserving the win.

"At the one mile mark, it was three Springfield runners running neck-and-neck with three of ours, but within the next half mile, two of the Springfield runners pulled ahead, and we just couldn't run with them," LaFreniere said.

UMass' top runner was Becky Johnson, who finished in 18:46, followed by Tricia Mathiesen in 18:47 and Michelle St. Laurent in 19:00.

Kim Liljeblad was the Minutewomen's next finisher, seventh overall with a time of 19:16. Rounding out the top five for UMass was freshmen Julie Moreau.

"Kim ran a great race, (1:07 better than last week) and I was very impressed with Kerry (Aker) and Lee Ann (Ambrose). I would've liked to be 3-0 by now, but we've just been hit by a lot of injuries to key people, and Springfield was much better than we expected," LaFreniere said.

Next week, the Minutewomen travel to Hanover, NH for the Dartmouth Invitational in a meet LaFreniere calls, "Really tough, however Becky has been getting better with each meet, and hopefully Cheryl and Tracy will be back and we might even see Kelly, although after six weeks off, I don't know if you can ask too much from her."

Field hockey stays hot

Improves record to 7-0 with two wins

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team must have enjoyed their weekend at home, as they kept their perfect record intact, and shutout both of their opponents. They beat Atlantic-10 rival Rutgers University 2-0 and Lafayette College 4-0.

UMass (7-0) was able to adjust to the two teams' styles, as they played agressively against Rutgers, and mixed up the tempo against Lafayette.

In Saturday's action, UMass netted two first half goals, one by Holly Hockenbrock and the other by Tara Jelley. Sunday's game was highlighted by a Jenn Salisbury hat trick. In both games, UMass scored early.

Tara Jelley scored almost instantly against Rutgers, putting the ball in at 33:49 past goalie Jody Deem. Hockenbrock posted her second goal of the year at 9:56 in the first half.

The taunting and stick play of the Lady Knights was as notable as the rest of the action. The Lady Knights seemed as if they wanted to drag the Minutewomen down to a dirty level of play.

"It was ugly and boring," lamented coach Pam Hixon. "They were rough, and we were only trying to defend ourselves. We didn't play like we were intimidated at all by them."

The win against Rutgers puts UMass in excellent position in the Atlantic 10. They have only two more A-10 teams on their schedule, before the A-10 tournament at the end of the year, and they are already in first place.

If UMass wants to finish first in the nation, they must continue to dominate teams of Lafayette's caliber. Yesterday, Salisbury scored in the first minute. The 1-0 lead was all that UMass needed, but the Minutewomen, and especially Salisbury weren't done.

The second goal occurred when Salisbury went to her left, and backhanded a shot right over the goalie's head. The goal was notable because of the usual difficulty in lifting the ball in field hockey.

"I've been practicing all year going to my left, and I just turned my stick and lifted it, and it deflected off of the defender's stick," explained Salisbury.

Salisbury netted her second hat trick of the year, scoring her third goal in the second half. The big 4-0 lead allowed Hixon to substitute five players, as she decided to give the younger players some experience. Backup goalie Tina Rusiecki shared the shutout with Philippa Scott, who started the game.

Dawn Trumbauer's goal before halftime gave the Minutewomen a comfortable 3-0 lead.

Rosenberg, Dagarin vie for State Senate

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

A long month of campaigning for State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) and Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin concludes today, when the special election to fill the State Senate seat vacated by John Olver will be decided at the polls.

Rosenberg, a three-time state representative, is considered a heavy favorite over Dagarin, whose only other run for public office came against Olver for the State Senate in the general election of 1990.

The seat became open in June when Olver was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in a special election to fill the seat vacated by the late Silvio Conte.

Although Dagarin, a conservative Republican, is aware of his status as underdog, he said it wouldn't change his approach to the election.

"No question [I'm the underdog]," Dagarin said. "I've never seen myself as running against Stan Rosenberg, but for the seat in the State Senate.

In the Franklin-Hampshire Senate district, comprising the 21 local communities that will be voting today, registered Democrats outnumber registered Republicans by a 3-1 margin. Approximately half of the district's voters are independents.

Rosenberg campaign manager Ken Bazinet said though he wasn't concerned about overconfidence on the part of the Rosenberg campaign, he was concerned about having a large enough turnout for the election.

"I'm a little concerned about apathy," Bazinet said. "We need everyone from students, faculty and everyone else throughout the district to turn out and vote.

"I cringe every time I hear Stan's a shoo-in," Bazinet said. "I want Stan to win and win decisively and to have a clear mandate."

Dagarin said that the thrust of his campaign strategy centered on going through local communities and meeting as many potential voters as possible.

"My decision was to spend time with voters by going door-to-door and making phone calls," Dagarin said.

The two candidates have had only one radio debate and one candidate's forum, with the Rosenberg campaign having advocated more public exchange between the two candidates.

"It is a misconception on any candidate's part not to stand up and be heard," Bazinet said. "Debate's guarantee media coverage and can reach a lot of people — voters would have been left with a clear choice."

Dagarin said that while he was "not opposed to debates," he felt his time was better spent meeting voters in person.

"[Personal contact] was the best way to communicate my message," Dagarin said.

The polls will be open from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m.

Dark Days on Campus

Public higher education topic of panel

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Perhaps yesterday's gloomy weather provided an appropriate setting for the filming of last night's panel on the current state of the University of Massachusetts.

Although the program focused on the problems plaguing higher education, panelists were able to offer some possible solutions, such as Provost Glen Gordon's suggestion to raise the state's sales tax from 5 to 6 percent to fund education in the state.

The panel, part of Springfield television station Channel 40's program titled "Dark Days on Campus," featured 12 students, faculty and administrators from throughout the state who are actively involved in Massachusetts' higher education. The panel was filmed live and aired from 8 to 9 p.m. last night.

Host Ray Hershel of Channel 40 noted the theme of the program when he asked panelists about "the bottom line — what about the quality of education at Massachusetts state colleges and universities."

Ronald Story, a UMass history professor, said "teaching is suffering," largely as a result of increased class sizes and the increased workload that professors are forced to take on.

Gordon said budget cuts the higher education system has suffered have not served to streamline the system and eliminate waste.

"We've been cutting for the past four years now," Gordon said. "If there was fat there, we've cut it and now we're into the muscle."

Holyoke Community College President David Bartley said the cuts to higher education have hurt the mission of the state's colleges and universities.

"We're supposed to be about access, diversity and quality," Bartley said, calling the rising tuition in the state system a "tax" on students.

[The state] has passed a tax — call it what you want," Bartley said. "The tragedy is that we are part of the solution, not part of the problem."

State Education Secretary Piedad Robertson, a member of the panel, noted that the Weld Administration was looking toward solutions for the "hard issues of renovation, repair and maintenance."

Robertson also noted that the system is suffering a loss of students, particularly through students continuing their education part-time. She said the rate of part-time students nationwide was 16.1 percent of students in college, up sharply over the past decade.

At one point during the program, Hershel pointed to the mostly empty auditorium and asked about apathy among members of the UMass community.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editor-in-Chief Gayle Long said "it all goes back to apathy — we've had rallies, had

UN team detained by Iraqi soldiers after surprise search

By PETER JAMES SPIELMANN
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Iraqi soldiers detained U.N. officials for more than 12 hours in a Baghdad building Monday, then forcibly confiscated documents that apparently show Iraq has been developing nuclear weapons.

The inspectors found the papers in a surprise search several hours before the U.N. Security Council met to discuss Iraqi obstructions to U.N. searches for hidden weapons and production facilities.

The inspectors hauled seven carloads of papers from an Iraqi government building, but authorities stopped the team, held its members for 12 hours and "forcibly" seized the data, officials said.

Rolf Ekeus, head of the U.N. special commission in charge of finding and demolishing Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, said that before their detention the inspectors had copied some of the key documents with their own portable copying machines.

The confrontation appeared likely to lead the Security Council to accept President Bush's offer to provide troops to guard the inspectors and warplanes to escort U.N. helicopter searches. No formal council meeting was immediately scheduled.

Bush to UN: Repeal Zionism stand

By CHRISTOPHER CONNELL
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — President Bush called today for the repeal of a 1975 United Nations resolution that equates Zionism with racism, saying it is time to address old feuds that bedevil world peace.

In remarks before the U.N. General Assembly, Bush said Iraq was contemptuous of U.N. resolutions that require Saddam Hussein's regime to cooperate with U.N. inspection teams looking for mass weapons. "His contempt continues even as I am speaking," said Bush.

In his speech, Bush said that to equate Zionism with racism "is to reject Israel itself."

"Zionism is not a policy, it was an idea that led to the home of the Jewish people in the state of Israel." Bush said.

As for Iraq, Bush said United Nations sanctions must remain in place as long as Saddam Hussein remains in power.

"We cannot compromise for a moment in seeing that Iraq destroys all its weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them, and we shall not compromise.

Bush spoke as U.N. officials disclosed that Iraq had detained a team of U.N. nuclear weapons inspectors in Baghdad who had found documents apparently proving that Iraq has been developing nuclear weapons.

Bush's speech several days after he served notice that he was willing to send American firepower back to the Persian Gulf to back up U.N. inspection efforts.

Bush also called for the release of the western hostages being held in Lebanon, saying, "Let's put the law above the crude and cowardly practice of hostage holding."

The president opened his speech by saying there is a chance for peace and prosperity in a world "leavened by the cold war's end."

He called on all nations to work to resolve border disputes peacefully, noting that as Communism has fallen, old ethnic hatreds have sprung to life.

He also extolled the virtues of free market economies in the world."

Trump jilts fiancee Marla Maples

AP photo

Marla Maples

NEW YORK (AP) — The big question now is: Who gets to keep the $250,000 ring?

Donald Trump revealed Sunday that he has broken up with fiancee Marla Maples, this time for good.

"I want to remain good friends with her," Trump told the Daily News. "But it's time to step aside and look in other directions."

In a statement, Maples said, "I'm so sorry that the media has once again been inappropriately drawn into the personal lives of Donald and myself. I only hope to now move on with my life in a more positive and constructive manner."

It's the second split for the couple, whose two-year romance has been closely scrutinized since Trump split up with his wife, Ivana.

After parting for a week in July, Trump and Maples reconciled, and he gave the former Miss Georgia runner-up a $250,000, 7.45-carat diamond engagement ring. They did not set a wedding date.

The New York Post reported today that Trump never paid for the ring. Instead, the Harry Winston Jewelry company gave it to him knowing it would bring better publicity than money could buy, the Post said.

Which raises the question: What kind of publicity would the store get if it repossessed the ring?

The Daily News said the couple split Friday night at Maples' Manhattan apartment after a shouting match that left Maples in tears.

"Marla is just a wonderful, beautiful woman, very talented, with a future as a model or an actress," Trump told the News.

There is no word on any new girlfriend for the developer and casino owner, the newspaper said. It also wasn't clear whether Trump asked for the ring back.

COINS to join private sector in new center

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts and industrial researchers from the private sector will be working together when the Computer and Information Science department unveils a new national research center for computer science in October.

Some of the profits, if any, from a corporation formed by the center will go to the University, according to Paul A. McOwen, COINS industrial affiliates program director, .

The Center for Real-Time, Intelligent, Complex Computing Systems will have corporate researchers working along with UMass graduate students and faculty, according to COINS officials.

"I don't think there is anything quite like it," he added. "The significant thing about the center is the close partnership with government, industry and the University."

About a dozen researchers will be sent to UMass by companies involved in the project. Those named as partners include Alliant Technologies, Bay State Medical, Digital Equipment, General Dynamics, General Electric, GTE, Hughes, Texas Instruments and Rockwell International.

The University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester is also involved.

Among the many projects which CRICCS will be involved in is "intelligent vehicle highway systems," used to anticipate oncoming highway collisions and take action to prevent them.

Research in automated manufacturing will be conducted, hopefully to produce "intelligent" robots, which will be more instrumental and versatile than those performing single tasks on assembly lines, officials said.

Also, computer systems are being developed to coordinate information in hospitals and facilities will be set aside for the blending and testing of polymer substances to create new polymer blends.

A grant of $1.2 million from the National Science Foundation forms the base for the funding of the center, according to McOwen.

The Department of Defense and the private-sector partners have also contributed funding to the program. The COINS department is currently seeking state aid.

It has not been determined whether a new building will be erected or an old one will be renovated, said McOwen.

"It depends on state support," he said.

"Technology will be moved out very rapidly from the University to a corporation called Axiom," McOwen said. "If there is a profit, a significant portion is to be returned to the University."

McOwen expressed hope that the new center would create new financial rewards for the state and regained respect for UMass. He pointed to the success of software companies which are spinoffs of the UMass COINS department.

Firms organized by UMass faculty and students have generated $18 million in revenues, with one-third of that from international commerce, he said.

Another installment of Campus Center basement notes

Well once again the duty to enlighten and delighten has fallen on my somewhat narrow shoulders. So away we go...

President Bush continued to push his role as the Vacation President last week when he took a cross country trip to visit the Grand Canyon. I'd like to know how much it's going to be for a concert tour shirt.

Do you know me? I'm a UMass student. Everyday I walk long distances, eat substandard nutritional stuff, sleep through endless lecture after endless lecture, spend all night studying and writing papers. I put up with tuition hikes, budget cuts, teacher strikes and rally after rally. That's why on the weekends I carry one of these. [audience please imagine beer can]

I make $1.20 an hour for this (no, not for my column, for other stuff). Last year it was $.60 an hour. I've been saving up to buy a luxury item next week. How much is a Timex anyway?

I won't swear to it, but it's a pretty safe bet to say the Amherst Fire Chief said something similar to the following last weekend: "Southwest? Those bastards! I'm not going back there again until I can see the fire from my office window, dammit!"

Graffitti of the week! I know you guys love this right? Both of you? Well this week I saw this written in some obscure corner in the Campus Center complex: "Support mental health or I will stick pins in your eyes."

Chewing tin foil while in a microwave could be dangerous.

Marc Elliot

Has anyone seen this recruiting ad: "There was a time when a group of men got together to fight for a just cause. Men of courage and metal. The Democratic Party ... we're looking for a few good presidential candidates with a clean political past that is prominent enough to take on an aggressive campaign against a popular incumbent. Do you have the metal to be mean?" Didn't think so.

Wouldn't it be cool to have a dentist who is also a mob crime boss? Well if you live around Haverhill, Mass., you might have. Dr. Francis P. Bonasia, family dentist and gambling godfather, gave the thumbs up to an armored car robbery that was foiled by the FBI earlier this month in Newburyport. "Look kid, if you miss the spit cup one more time, I'm gonna size you up for some concrete fillings. You'll be sleepin' with the fishes I tell ya." Or, "You come to me with this broken filling on my daughter's wedding day. You don't even have the respect to call me godfather?"

I guess you really can die of plaque.

Whether or not you care for the fraternity, you have to give those guys over in Pike credit for a sense of humor. Have you seen their rush poster? It has a picture of a dog with a gun pointed at its head with the command "rush" written to the side. Now comes the funny part. With its history of being featured on the editorial page now and then last semester, those wacky guys over at Pike wrote at the bottom of the poster: "This is a parody, so please don't write the Collegian."

Look, people, I really don't want to spend my afternoons lurking about public restrooms so please, please, please, send me something for graffitti of the week. If you have any good jokes or cool comments, complaints, or even compliments (I have no shame) or maybe you think I'm just too goofy for words, please send me some mail at: Marc Elliott, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, 113 Campus Center.

Until next time, remember, "The road would belong to me... Bob."

"Bart Simpson: union dude" takes control of his work life

Not too long ago, Bart Simpson entered the workforce. Needing money, he agreed to do some work for an elderly neighbor. After a week of back-breaking work, Bart got his pay: two shiny quarters.

Bart's protests fell on deaf (and senile) ears. He slunk home with his 50 cents and an attitude — "Work is for chumps." Homer was proud. "I didn't learn that until I was twice your age," he said.

Jeremy Levinson

I think maybe we can learn a lesson, too. Work may be for chumps when you're 12. Eventually — chump or not — most of us go to work. In fact, work is or will be our main activity for the bulk of our lives. At least one-third of our waking hours will be spent on the job. Our pay, schedules and benefits will help decide what opportunities and choices are open to us.

Just like Bart Simpson, we are largely at the whim of our employers. The boss decides what we'll do, when, how, and how much we'll get paid for it. The old job-hunting adage, "You gotta sell yourself," rings true. For 40 hours or so a week, we are bought and paid for.

Reeling from his brief foray, Bart has temporarily dropped out of the work force. Such luxury is reserved for 12-year-old cartoon characters and a very tiny, tiny, very rich sliver of the population.

So what alternative do the rest of us have to letting our bosses have so much control over our lives? Well, whenever employees get together and decide to exert some control over their work-lives, it's called a union.

The idea of a union carries much baggage. So much, in fact, that we forget what unionism is all about. Quite simply, organizing a union is what people do in order to have a voice in the workplace.

As a point of mathematical fact, unionized workers make 20 to 50 percent more than similar non-union workers. They enjoy far greater benefits and tend to keep their jobs longer. Union members are protected from abuse and arbitrary dismissal. The not-so-mathematical dimension of unionism is that it gives back to workers some control over their work-lives.

If Bart had been union, his brief excursion into the workplace would have happened differently. His employer would have had to sit down and negotiate a wage that both thought were fair. His responsibilities would have been spelled out clearly and Bart could have held his head up high.

Bart, like so many of us, isn't a union member. So, he gets screwed and lives with it.

The case for organizing is clear. So why is it that so many of us work in unorganized shops? First, I guess, is that most of us shy away from what organizing takes — hard work. No one is going to hand us better lives. We have no control over our lives 40 hours a week. Wouldn't it be better to take back that control but have to put in a little extra time, building a union?

Also, our culture is full of ghost stories about unions. Most of the public's union awareness is focused on the national, higher level organizations.

News photos dealing with unions are usually of old men in suits, passing over the reality that most union staff are underappreciated workaholics. We hear plenty about Jimmy Hoffa and AFL-CIO officials but very little about how unions help people make concrete change on the personal level.

Furthermore, anti-union mythology is generally rammed down the throat of any worker who raises the issue. Bosses don't like unions. When you're the one making the decisions — and the money — you don't want to share power. Backed up against a wall, employers find a million reasons that workers are better off without a voice in the workplace.

The bottom line? Organized workers have a tool they can use to make their lives easier. Young Bart got burned in his first job. You can bet that his next one will be a union job. He's pretty quick and will learn from his mistake.

We in the real world will have to start learning that when it comes to our jobs, there is one question: Do we want to improve our lives?

Quality, not quantity is the answer to UMass' problems

Chancellor Richard O'Brien's new plan to help the University by luring in 3,000 new students is not one of the better ideas to come out of Whitmore in a while.

Neil Carpenter

On the surface, getting $9.3 million in additional revenue sounds great. Yet, how much of this money will go towards relieving our deepest problem — too many students and too few teachers? What good is spending $10,000 a year for college if one has no professors? The second issue is obvious; where are the 3,000 new students going to come from?

Director of Undergraduate Admissions Timm Rinehart talked about doing more direct mail and college fairs. UMass already mails many high school seniors acceptance letters, even though they never applied. UMass is not exactly a big secret, being the biggest public college in the state.

Realistically, there are only three ways to get more students. One, prove to high school seniors and their families with money that UMass is better than private college "X." Considering the cuts and the 110 percent acceptance rate over the last few years, this isn't going to happen too often.

Second, we could steal students from other Massachusetts state colleges by convincing them that they should go to UMass-Amherst instead. Not only is this like trying to steal your best friend's girlfriend but it would touch off a recruitment war.

The third way is to get students who would not be going to college to come to UMass. There are many people who can't afford college and yet still have the intellect to be in college. The problem, however, is that UMass doesn't have the money to give these people enough financial aid or they would be here now.

There are many more people, however, who aren't here because they shouldn't be here. Some 18-year-olds aren't mature enough or sufficiently academically oriented to handle college. People have a right to be educated, but if they didn't get anything out of 12 years of schooling, they're not ready for college.

What we all have to realize is that if we want a real education and not a piece of worthless paper, then we need to focus on quality, not quantity. Adding more students who are going to need special attention is not the best way to educate the students who are already here.

Neil Carpenter is a UMass student

No disguise for gay-bashing

Michael Morrissey, your colossal ignorance astounds me. Granted, the campus housing situation has achieved unrivaled levels of laughability, but you use your complaints of the housing policies ("Housing Policies Making On-Campus Life Miserable," Sept. 20) as a vehicle for vapid and insidious gay-bashing.

What, exactly, is so shocking about a straight man witnessing a gay man "unpacking his homosexual paraphernalia in the room with the man's 'lover' present?" I find it difficult to sympathize with some poor straight guy who experiences this on the only floor in the only dorm of the whole University even concerned with lesbian and gay men's needs, when this straight guy has the entire rest of the campus as his heterosexual playground.

Lesbian and gay men wade through heterosexual paraphernalia daily, in the guise of "normal student necessities" like the pictures on magazine covers in Munchies or posters advertising for Spring Break in some exotic place. We are bombarded with heterosexual couples holding hands and kissing — being in the same room with them is not even an issue.

It is true that Housing is failing miserably at educating the straight masses about lesbian and gay issues, but to pass that off as a reason for us to inhibit our already cramped lifestyles is not a solution. Tell me, Mr. Morrissey, what is the point of having homosexual paraphernalia if we have to keep it in our suitcases under our beds? What is the reason for having a "lover" if we cannot be in the same room together — or can we only be queer if we are single?

The answer to these questions and many, many more are there for your enlightenment, Mr. Morrissey, if you would just open your petty mind.

BEFORE TRUSTING YOUR FUTURE TO ANY COMPANY, ASK FOR SOME LETTERS OF REFERENCE.

You put more than just your savings into a retirement company. You put in your trust and hopes for the future, too. So before you choose one, ask some questions. How stable is the company? How solid are its investments? How sound is its overall financial health?

A good place to start looking for answers is in the ratings of independent analysts. Three companies, all widely recognized resources for finding out how strong a financial services company really is, gave TIAA their top grade.

IN THE FINAL ANALYSIS, TIAA IS LETTER-PERFECT.

TIAA received A+ from A.M. Best Co., AAA from Standard & Poor's and Aaa from Moody's Investors Service. These ratings reflect TIAA's reliable claims-paying ability, exceptional financial strength, superior investment performance, and low expenses. With its guaranteed rate of return and opportunity for dividends, TIAA is one of less than ten companies, out of 2,200 nationwide, that received these highest marks.

CREF. FOUR MORE LETTERS EVERYONE SHOULD KNOW.

For further growth potential and diversification, there's the CREF variable annuity with four different investment accounts to give you the flexibility you want as you save for the future.

Together, TIAA and CREF form the nation's largest private retirement system, with over $95 billion in assets and more than 70 years of experience serving the education community. For over one million people nationwide, the only letters to remember are TIAA-CREF.

Escape to the University Gallery's Permanent Collection

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

When your gen-eds couldn't possibly get any drier; your head aches from studying; and your friends are driving you nuts, it's time to take a walk to the University Gallery, located in the Fine Arts Center.

A hop, skip and a jump from the crazy ducks is the perfect place for quiet reflection: Given Highlights: A Selection of Gifts from the Permanent Collection. This exhibit has pieces of art that will appeal to all tastes, from sculpture to photography. The pieces' dates range from 1880 to 1991. The collection was begun in 1962.

This is the kind of art to get lost in. Roy Lichenstein's "Reclining Nude" (1923) is delightfully garish with bright oranges and black and white diagonal stripes. Follow the jagged lines with your eyes. Note the details in the heavily lidded eye and the disproportioned hand. Art is fun. It's colored pieces like these which break up this largely black and white exhibit.

For those of you with a craving for "star watching" there is a pencil on paper still life by Robert Deniro, who is the father of the well known actor. Though black and white, I could sense the color and life in those curvy black lines.

"Mass, Aftermath" (1982), a charcoal on paper, reminded me a lot of Southwest with its combination of "organic" (a tree) and "geometric shapes" (similiar to the "towers") "within a constantly moving panoramic perspective." The quotes were supplied by the University Gallery's news release. I also liked the depth, and the grubby, earthy feel of the charcoal.

The dreamy woman snuggled into a fur collar in James Joseph Jacques Tissot's etching, entitled "Promenade dans la Niege," in French salon style, is simultaneously cold like the snow in the background and warm, with her hands tucked into her fur muff.

I didn't particularly care for the photographs taken in Beverly Hills, supposedly depicting women as survivors, but the photos by Manuel Alvarez Bravo, part of a portfolio of 15 prints selected by the artist in 1979, were imaginative and thought provoking. Maybe you'll disagree, but you have to go to the gallery and check them out first.

The collection is small but that just makes it easier to stand/sit in front of one piece longer — plenty of time to see everything. I encourage you to study some of the pieces. They're easy to get lost in and it doesn't hurt as much as "Introduction to Logic."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Someone close to you is in the limelight. Show more confidence in this person's ideas and abilities! You can be a tower of strength to a friend in need. Offer encouragement.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Discuss what you have in mind with other household members. Otherwise, you could overlook something. Protect your assets. A real estate proposition deserves further investigation.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Be vigilant today. Watch your business competition for tricks and unfair methods. You are not the only one bewildered by a recent chain of events. Sound out potential allies by asking indirect questions.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Put your reputation first when negotiating a contract. Failure to do so could result in serious financial losses or complications. Brash acts could land you in the poorhouse.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Get as far ahead as you can with a special project. The favorable atmosphere that prevails now could suddenly change. Romance is much more than you expected. Search your heart for an answer.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Scrutinize business plans with a magnifying glass. A private matter is finally settled to your satisfaction. The evening favors relaxing pursuits alone or with your family.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Take stock of your special qualities and talents. You may be able to capitalize on them, even if you must work in secret. Taking someone at face value would be a mistake.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Do not be content with just thinking, wishing or planning. If you take direct action now, you will soon have extra money in the bank! Widen your social circle by attending more parties.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Leave nothing to chance. Allow for possible delays. Refuse to let a disappointment become an obsession. Replenish your energy by eating wisely and getting regular exercise.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Move surely but quietly to carry out a project close to your heart. Profits rise. Be cautious this evening. A loved one could say one thing but mean another. Be discreet.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Home is your best place of refuge now. Relax with those who understand your hopes and dreams. Try not to dominate family discussions. Taking a more mellow approach will improve a close relationship.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Not a good day to take risks. Unexpected developments complicate your plans. Protect yourself from negative influences. Avert a direct confrontation by offering to mediate a domestic squabble.

Men's soccer riding high after tie with UVM

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

Senior UMass goalie Jon Gruber is called "Boomer" by his teammates, for his long, arching punts after making an unbelievable save. But a name like "Savior" might have been more appropriate last Saturday afternoon, when Gruber achieved one of the rarest feats in soccer: he saved a penalty shot with only a few seconds left in regulation, to preserve a 1-1 tie with the University of Vermont.

The teams then played two 10-minute overtime periods but neither team scored.

With the clock nearly expired in the second half, Vermont forward David Johnson closed in on net with two UMass defenders nearby. But he was taken down by the only one that managed to stay with him, and a penalty kick ensued. Vermont could have been granted no better opportunity to win the game.

Nor could Gruber have been offered a better chance to become a hero. Johnson lined the kick up with his left foot, and Gruber said that he initially thought Johnson would shoot the ball to his own right. Instead, Johnson shot it the other way, but the instinctive Gruber quickly changed his first guess and dove directly into the ball's path.

There was no scoring in the first half, and the Minutemen took a 1-0 lead about 10 minutes into the second half on what else: a penalty kick.

At that time, UMass fullback Todd Kylish found himself in an identical situation that Johnson had been in. Kylish, too, was brought down by a defender and was awarded a penalty kick. Kylish didn't squander his chance, launching a swift shot past freshman UVM goalie Robert Radakovic, into the net's top shelf to make it 1-0.

Randy Jacobs and the Minutemen have been playing some exciting soccer. They hope to continue the trend Wednesday against Dartmouth.

Though Vermont was relentless in its offensive attack, piling up 28 shots to UMass' 13, the Catamounts only score came with about 10 minutes remaining in the second half. It was then that midfielder Derek Samuelson collected a pass from fellow middy Jeffrey Courter, rifled a low-flying shot past Gruber into the net's lower left corner to tie the game at 1-1.

It was Gruber's only error in the match, as he proved to be the difference, making 11 saves, none more dazzling than the rarely-seen penalty kick save.

The Minutemen hardly pressured Radakovic, who was forced to make only 4 saves. UMass did take 5 shots in the second overtime (only three fewer than in the rest of the game), but none were on net.

The understandable fatigue of both teams showed in the overtimes, as neither could muster a good scoring opportunity and the game ended in a 1-1 tie.

UMass assistant coach Jon Guppy was thoroughly impressed with his team's complete effort, which the Minutemen will try to carry into their next match with Dartmouth Wednesday at 4 p.m. at Boyden Field.

Soccer notes: Which Boyden Field the game is played on will depend upon the playing conditions of Upper Boyden, the true home field of both the men's and women's soccer teams. The field was in such bad shape over the weekend that coaches feared for players' safety and the games were moved to Lower Boyden.

Water polo returns home after 2-2 weekend at Navy

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass water polo team split their four game trip to the first round of the Eastern Tournament at Navy this past weekend, providing several highlights and lowlights, but with the team probably staying at or near their pre-tournament national ranking of 17th. The eventual champion was host Navy.

"We had a down-then-up-weekend," said coach Russ Yarworth. "We really matured as a team."

UMass' first two games ended with loses by a combined five goals. Game one was a 12-9 defeat to archrival and 16th-ranked Iona, making the Minutemen 0-2 against the Gaels this season. Scott Reed and Javier Gonzalez each had three goals, with Reed adding an assist.

"I can't say they didn't play hard, but they didn't play with the sharpness and intensity needed to win," Yarworth said. "Our problem with Iona is that we don't match up well. They have a big aggressive team. We have to take them out of their power game and make them play our game.

Harvard, ranked 20th, provided the opposition for game two's 10-8 loss. Luke Harlan scored four goals on four shots, drawing praise from Yarworth, who said, "I got a nice surprise from my freshman lefty. We weren't doing anything and he came in and scored three straight goals." After the game Yarworth told the team they were "burying themselves first and then showing intensity."

UMass finally got on track in game three, a 13-6 win over unranked Buckne'l. Gonzalez and Reed scored three goals apiece, and Alex Yelensky and Jay Peluso scored two each. Todd Larson came up with 14 saves.

Like the previous games the team came out flat, going down 1-0, prompting Yarworth to call timeout, telling the team in no uncertain terms that they had to wake themselves up soon. The boys apparently listened as they ended the period ahead 6-1 and on their way to the blowout.

Continuing their habit for slow starts in the weekend finale against 15th ranked Brown, the Minutemen found themselves on the short end of a 3-0 score in the first quarter.

"We went out and immediately stank up the pool," Yarworth said. Yarworth believes that Brown, the best team in the east for the past few years, creates a certain "mystique" amongst opposing players and even referees.

"We have a very strong 2-meter game, and we were being held, sunk, and pulled down," Yarworth said. "We had four straight offensive possessions with foul turnovers."

In an effort to fire his troops up Yarworth decided to try for his first technical of the young season. His personal intention backfired, as his badgering of the officials earned him an unexpected ejection and a view from a window outside the building. The effect on the team was perfect as they pulled ahead 5-4 at the end of the second quarter, on their way to a much needed and well deserved 12-10 win.

Tsan Engin scored four goals and Reed had his third three-goal-game of the weekend, and a total of 10. Jay Peluso had two key steals and a goal in the critical fourth quarter.

With regard to individual efforts Yarworth said, "Scott Reed became a man this weekend. He was a force and is taking the leadership role. I was especially pleased with the hole play of 'T' (Engin), and Alex (Yelensky). Especially 'T', who on 2-meter 'D' was immense going both ways."

On freshman Gonzalez' eight goals Yarworth said, "I knew what we were getting. He brings a lot of creativity to our system."

This weekend the team plays its closest games to this campus as they travel down the street to Amherst College as the Lord Jeffs host the New England vs. Mid-Atlantic Challenge. Participating schools include Boston College, MIT, Iona, Queens and Fordham. Amherst will play the 'B' teams from UMass, MIT, and B.C.

Women's tennis beats UVM, meets Hartford

By LILLIAN K. LEGGIO
Collegian Correspondent

Four matches in seven days was the strenuous schedule the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team embarked upon Sunday when they battled the University of Vermont. Fortunately for the Minutewomen, they got off on the right foot by defeating the Catamounts 6-3. Today, as UMass (2-2) travels to Connecticut to face the University of Hartford (3-2), they hope the momentum from Sunday's win will help drive them to another victory.

"Right now we are playing great tennis," said UMass coach Edwin Gentzler. "Beating a solid Vermont team has given us a lot of momentum."

Inspite of all this confidence in his team, Gentzler concedes that Hartford is a good, strong team. Their No. 1 and 2 players, Linda Barton and Jessica Sklar haven't lost to UMass in three years. Last year, the teams split their two matches.

Sunday's match between the women's tennis teams of the University of Vermont and the University of Massachusetts was full of set tiebreakers, close point calls and three hour matches. Stamina, hard work and a perhaps a bit of luck were the elements that propelled the Minutewomen over the Catamounts by a 6-3 score.

UMass, which ended its two game losing streak, definitely needed stamina as three of their matches each surpassed three hours of play. In one of the matches, UMass' No. 1 player Shizuko Yamasaki lost the first set, but bounced back to win second and third set tiebreakers and defeat Missy Daniels 2-6, 7-6 (7-5), 7-6 (7-5).

Yet another of these marathon matches saw UMass' No. 2 player, Gail Girasella, win the first set, but drop the last two sets to lose to Katie Mixon 6-7 (7-3), 7-5, 6-1.

In the third of these matches, Amy Ryan, UMass No. 4 player, won first and last set tiebreakers to beat Cathy Kuebler 7-6 (7-1), 2-6, 7-6.

In other singles play, UMass' Kerensa Eddy rebounded from a first set loss and a tied third and deciding set to defeat Kate Holme 3-6, 6-0, 7-6 (7-3). UMass' Kerri Kamisnki thwarted a first set comeback by Kristen Ingersall winning both sets 7-6 (7-0), 6-1. UVM's only convincing win saw Britty Stern defeat Stacy Scheckner 6-1, 6-2.

At the end of singles play, UMass was leading 4-2 and momentum was clearly on their side.

"Vermont plays good doubles so this isn't over by a longshot," cautioned UMass coach Edwin Gentzler.

Doubles, however, didn't pose a threat to the Minutewomen's attack as they came away with a 2-1 win. UMass' Girasella and Eddy defeated Mixon and Holme 6-4, 7-5, 6-2. Yamasaki and Ryan beat Daniels and Stern. In UVM's doubles win, Kuebler and Ingersall defeated Scheckner and Pam Levine.

"We're pretty green and in more ways than one," said UVM coach Muff Parsons referring to the 10 freshmen on the team and UVM's school color.

In exibition singles matches, UMass' Kelly Grim and Pam Levine were victorious while UVM's Raleigh Garson defeated Sarah Nadolny. As for doubles exibition, Vermont's Sharon Ebehart and Lisa Johnson beat Pam Levine and Lesley Watts.

"We worked hard on our mental toughness this week," said Gentzler. "And when it counted it paid off for us."

Iona and Brown top men's cross country

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Staff

The casual observer walking near Orchard Hill Saturday afternoon might have thought that the race being run through the orchards was solely between Iona and Brown. Essentially it was, as the top 10 finishers were all from either Iona or Brown.

There were two other teams in the race, however, and the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team was one of them. UMass finished third in the meet, well behind Iona and Brown but ahead of Northeastern. Iona scored 33 points to edge Brown, who scored 35. UMass scored 75 points to Northeastern's 85.

Iona took the top four spots, led by Packie Mulvaney, who won the five-mile race in 26:03. Brown kept the score close by taking places five through 10 but Iona's fifth runner placed 24th to clinch the victory.

Craig Cormier was the top finisher for UMass, taking 11th place in a time of 26:47. Other harriers among the top five for the Minutemen were Pat Reed (14th, 27:07), Matt Simon (15th, 27:07), Mike Davis (17th, 27:19) and Keith Willis (18th, 27:19).

UMass coach Ken O'Brien said that he had expected his team to be battling for third place.

"I expected us to be a little behind Iona and Brown," O'Brien said. "They're a couple of good teams and I knew that they would be battling for the top spot.

"I did notice some plusses today. There's no doubt in my mind that we ran better as a top five than we did last week. We made some real progress but we still have a ways to go."

The Minutemen next compete in the Dartmouth Classic Sept. 28.

Rosenberg defeats Dagarin in election

By JASON GEORGE and MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg of Amherst easily defeated Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin in yesterday's special election for the Hampshire-Franklin seat in the Massachusetts State Senate.

Early returns of unofficial results from 19 of the 21 communities in the senate district showed Rosenberg with 6,525 votes to Dagarin's 2,741.

Rosenberg, a three-time state representative, was a heavy favorite ever since he defeated Northampton Mayor David Musante in the Democratic primary on August 27. The seat was vacated in June when John Olver was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives.

State Senate election winner Stanley Rosenberg shakes hands with a well-wisher last night at the Hadley American Legion.

From the posting of the initial returns at 8:30 p.m. until the victorious candidate's entrance at 9:50 p.m., the atmosphere at Rosenberg's campaign party at the Hadley American Legion was one of quiet confidence and optimism.

Rosenberg entered and immediately stood on a chair and said, tongue-in-cheek, "I think we won." He was surrounded by about 150 campaign workers and well-wishers.

"I believe very strongly in the representative form of government," Rosenberg said. "It's my wish to work hard and achieve something for people every day."

Rosenberg said he felt the voters "agree with the agenda I put forward. . . they just said go to work."

"I felt that we did what we could and we can be proud," Dagarin said in his concession statement to a crowd of 50 people. "In some way, I still want to represent those people [that voted for me]."

Dagarin said he felt satisfied to be able to discuss the issues of his campaign, centering on "family values."

"I want to thank Stan Rosenberg for running a clean campaign," Dagarin said.

Dagarin said he had respect for Rosenberg for continuing his legislative duties during the campaign, noting "I'm sure the temptation was there to cut out Boston and stay here [to campaign]."

Among members of the campaign, Rosenberg's victory was not the story but rather the lackluster voter turnout. The district consists of approximately 74,000 voters.

Rosenberg campaign worker Jon Hite and others noted the large number of recent area elections, the timing of the special election and Dagarin's reluctance to debate Rosenberg as factors contributing to the light turnout.

Although final figures were not available at press time, preliminary tallies in South Hadley showed only 13 percent of the electorate voted.

"There was a very low turnout, with one election after another in the area," Hite said. "A lot of people became complacent because they saw the stark difference between Rosenberg and Dagarin and they felt Stan was going to be a shoo-in.

"We worked hard during the campaign because Stan's message was one of hope — which is needed in these times," Hite said. "Stan didn't stop working just because Dagarin wouldn't debate."

During the general election campaign, the two candidates had only one radio debate and one candidate's forum. Dagarin said his intent was to concentrate his time on meeting voters in person and establishing contact through telephone calls.

Ted Belsky, a Rosenberg organizer from South Hadley, said he felt voters weren't presented with enough information about the candidates.

"This campaign was almost a non-campaign — there weren't any clear issues," Belsky said. "For those who really know the candidates, the choice was clear. [Dagarin] didn't have a campaign he was really willing to take to the voters."

Unofficial returns from local communities showed Rosenberg winning 3,255 to 401 in Amherst, 836 to 412 in South Hadley and 5,781 to 1,837 in Northampton, with one precinct yet to report.

Health service charges increase

Grad Senate argues increases made without input

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

The additional payments for certain medical services instituted this semester by University Health Services were decided without student input, Graduate Student Senate leaders charged yesterday.

GSS Treasurer Sarah Lyon said during a GSS meeting Tuesday night that graduate students who sat on various fee-structuring committees last spring were unaware of the implementation of co-payments for services such as physical and gynecological examiniations.

"I realize things [due to the budget cuts] have to change," Lyon said. "But I'm objecting to how these changes took place."

Lyon said the main problem rests with the co-payments for certain types of services, such as surgical visits and visits to the urgent care ward between the hours of 9 p.m. and 8 a.m., which will now cost $10 for students without the Supplemental Health Benefits Plan.

Students could be charged up to $50 for certain prescriptions, $25 for physical examiniations and $10 for weekend and evening visits, according to several advertisments printed in the Collegian.

The undergraduate appointees to the board that advises UHS are unknown, according to Student Government President David Gagne. It is also unknown if there was any undergraduate input on the panel, Gagne said.

UHS Director David Kraft said the co-payments and rises in pharmaceutical costs can be attributed to skyrocketing health costs and the cost of electricity and heat.

"We could not have an increase in the fee," Kraft said. "This current year, we also have to look to the utility fee."

The utility fee will be phased in over a four-year period, said Joyce Hatch, University budget director.

"All auxiliary services, such as Housing, Dining, Campus Center and Health Services, are required to pay for their utilities, but they haven't been charged," she said. "Now, to buffer the impact, these fees are being incorporated over a four-year period. The Auxiliary enterprises this year will pay 25 percent of the utility fee, and over the four years, will then pay all utility costs."

Hatch said Kraft and UHS were under a great amount of Panel talks on Black issues

By SONDRA SUTTON
Collegian Staff

Last night at the University of Massachusetts, members of the African-American faculty, administration and student body gathered together to discuss various issues concerning the African -American community.

The facilitator, Professor of African Studies Ernest Allen , started the meeting with a brief introduction of the faculty and administrators present. Professor Allen then discussed some of the problems which African-Americans face now and in the future.

Allen stressed a need for the African-American community to address these problems and put an end to the negative situations in the community, stating "Many of you will find yourselves in the middle class, however you must not forget the problems we are facing in our community. What ever we are leaving behind will pull us down."

Telephone operators help to connect

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Correspondent

In the depths of the Whitmore administration building, unseen by most, lies the true nerve center of the University of Massachusetts. Just dial "0" to reach the pulse of the campus.

Beep. "University. May I help you?" Dorothy Cleveland speaks into her headset, fingers poised near a large, specially compiled phone book propped on a wooden stand. But she doesn't need the book, and she promptly reels off the number, imprinted in her memory through time. Dorothy, or "Dolly" to the others who work here, has been a University operator for almost 26 years, and like the others she knows most of the numbers by heart.

Their faces are not publicly recognized, their names are not common to the vast majority of the student body. But they know us. They know everything that is happening on this campus. We talk to these nameless, faceless voices every day.

"People don't realize that we are the heartbeat of what's happening around here," says Joyce Culver, who has been an operator for two years. "We are tapped in to the whole campus."

Their headquarters is a small room, with four or five desks, some plants, a few computer terminals. There are phones, just like every office in Whitmore, but there are also several strange, small brown consoles that look like laptop computers. Each console pressure to keep the standard health fee the same as spring 1991.

"He was backed into a corner," she said. "Last December, he was told to hold his fees [for this fall], even with the added utility charge. Then this summer, he was told to roll back his fee again, and took a $2 per student per year cut."

Hatch added, "It's important also, to realize that enrollment is down, health costs are higher and revenues are down."

Kraft said he was aware of the Graduate Employee Organization's demand for waivers on the health fees but said he did not know where the money would come from to cover the costs.

"If [Chancellor Richard O'Brien] decides graduate employees deserve the waiver, I expect he has an idea where the money will come from," Kraft said, but added there had been no dialogue with Chancellor Richard O'Brien as to the GEO demands.

The motion criticized the dismissal of student input for the additional payments as well as the $2 decrease in Basic Health Coverage and $40 increase in Supplemental Coverage, and will be read at the Faculty Senate meeting this Thursday.

Copies of the resolution will be sent to O'Brien, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin and Kraft, Lyon said. Lyon added there will be a health fee rally today at noon in front of the Whitmore Administration Building.

Grad employees teach-in at Whitmore

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Upset. Disappointed. Those are words Jill Havens uses to describe not being rehired as a teaching assistant due to the recent budget cuts.

Graduate teaching assistant Val Voorhis teaches an economics class outside Chancellor Richard O'Brien's office Tuesday as part of a Graduate Employee Organization teach-in at Whitmore.

But she is a member of the Graduate Employee Organization and supports actions to finalize contract negotiations with the administration.

Havens hopes to get her job back next semester.

Fifteen teaching assistants brought their classes to the Whitmore Administration Building yesterday to make a visible presence to the administration as well as students concerning the long-running GEO contract negotiation disputes.

"It disturbs me that an institution of higher learning takes an approach to treating its graduate employees as second-class citizens."

- Jack Conrad, Teaching Assistant

The GEO, which represents some 2,400 graduate student employees such as TAs and research assistants, would like to obtain from the University administration four major demands on their first union contract by the deadline of Oct 1.

The four demands are binding arbitration, an agency shop, a health fee waiver and job security.

Bernard Rohrbacher taught his Linguistics 101 section in the lobby of Whitmore "to show them [the administration] what we're willing to do. We'll see on Tuesday whether they are willing to move."

GEO leaders have threatened to take "decisive action" if their four demands are not met.

Peter Underdown, a research assistant in the COINS department and a GEO member, said "it's not a whole lot to ask. It's important to make a visible show of our strength."

Underdown believes the issue of the health fee waiver is the most important issue. Leaders of the GEO will hold a rally today at noon concerning this issue.

He added that the negotiations at this point resemble "a game of chicken."

Jack Conrad is a teaching assistant in the COINS department. "It disturbs me that an institution of higher learning takes an approach to treating its graduate employees as second-class citizens," Conrad said.

He pointed out the irony in a university that has its graduate employees playing a major role, yet not being respected. "It disturbs me," Conrad said.

Emily Isaacs, the co-speaker of the GEO/District 65/UAW, feels optimistic about obtaining the four demands on their first union contract.

"I guess I can only be hopeful," Isaacs said.

Dave Miller, a sophomore STEPEC major, was one of the undergraduates in a section taught by his TA in the Whitmore building. He said the GEO's actions this week probably will not make the administration budge on the contract.

"I support [the GEO] but I think it isn't going to do that much," Miller said. "I don't agree with passive resistance."

Employee assaulted

Compiled by DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

A building janitor in the Lederle Research Graduate Center was injured Monday evening by an unknown man, University of Massachusetts Police said.

The janitor discovered an unknown man in the janitor's room and soon after being discovered, the man "kicked out" at him, hitting him in the leg, police said.

Police said the assailant is a white male, 20-25 years of age, with black hair. At the time, he was seen wearing a torn blue sweatshirt and jeans.

A women was verbally assaulted by another woman, apparently without any provocation, near the Campus Pond Monday evening. Several witnesses confirmed the incident, police said.

Police have located the suspect but the victim does not wish to press charges. The suspect has been described as white female, 50 years old, wearing a camouflage jacket.

A juvenile female turned up at a police station Monday afternoon and said she was a runaway from Rhode Island. Police have made arrangements to assist in her return.

ARRESTS

• Jonathan C. Riber, 20, of New York, was arrested Monday evening on Governors Drive and charged with both driving at an unlawful speed and driving without a license.

• Scott Schaffer, 21, of New York, was arrested Monday night on Massachusetts Avenue and charged with both driving without a license and for failure to stop at a stop sign and a red light.

Professors debate multiculturalism tonight

A debate on the pros and cons of multiculturalism will be held at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union tonight at 7:30.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien will be moderating, as four professors debate whether multiculturalism is a "foe or ally of free inquiry."

Paul Hollander, professor of sociology, and Arnold Silver, professor of English, will be debating on the foe side.

Professor William Strickland of the Afro-American department and Margaret Cerullo, a social sciences professor from Hampshire College will take the stance of multiculturalism as an ally of free inquiry. Cerullo is the only speaker from outside the University to be included in this event.

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations, the Graduate Student Senate and the Student Government Association have sponsored the event.

This debate was inspired in part by the recent surge of rallies concerning one side of this topic, said Director of Human Relations, Grant Ingle.

"These rallies are diatribe, not discourse," he said

Ingle went on to explain that this debate is an attempt to spark more open discussion on campus around important topics and to better educate the students about the changing world.

Allen also discussed problems which people of color face here at the University. The Bannaker Lab, located in the New Africa House, has been forced to close earlier on the weekdays because of lack of funds and will only be open full time during midterm and finals periods.

In addition to budget cuts, Professor Allen also addressed the issue of a campus relations in the African-American community. Respect was the key word which was brought across at the meeting.

"I remember when you would respecta person until they proved not worthy of that respect, today it seems to be the other way around. First there is disrespect, then one has to prove himself. Let's respect one another first. Practice Black Civility," said Allen.

In addition to this discussion, many representatives from various organizations announced up and coming events that will be held here at the University, as well as the Five College area. Tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge at 7:30 p.m., William Strickland, Professor of African-American Studies, will be apart of a panel titled "Multiculturalism: Foe or Ally of Free Inquiry." African- Americans are asked to attend and show their support.

Members of the audience felt the meeting was very productive in meeting unfamillar member of the African-American community as well as keeping ties in and about people and issues which are detrimental to success of the African-American here at UMass, and across the nation.

Accountant writes upside-down

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Specialists intrigued by a woman's upside-down writing found she's a true lefty who developed the unusual style so she could see what she was writing.

Sue Colaizzi, 43, a tax accountant, turns tax forms and other documents around and writes upside-down. Her clients sit across from her and read the forms as she writes.

"It was far easier for me to write that way from the very beginning," Ms. Colaizzi said. "My teachers tried to get me to write right-side up, but they finally gave up."

Typically, left-handers cover their writing with their left hand as they write. Many left-handers rotate their paper in some fashion so they can see what they're writing.

"It's not uncommon to see these kids rotating the paper 90 degrees," said Gregory Slomka, a neuropsychologist at Allegheny General Hospital. "With Sue, we saw the ultimate logical extension of this."

emits an impatient "beep" every few seconds, demanding the attention of its gray-haired caretaker.

Jean Korpita has been working here for 29 years, and now she is the supervisor of this operator team. Jean was a University operator when they worked in Stockbridge Hall, back when their service consisted of a manually plugging cords into a board. Now the phones don't even ring; they beep. And a lot more has changed since then.

"The change that affected us the most was when our night hours were cut out," remembers June McCullough, who has been a University operator for over 24 years. "Those were the calls I enjoyed most. When students were lonely, or needed advice, they would call us. Some students who had never been away from home before would call and tell us they were going to bed."

Tina Galipeau, a relative newcomer, has been here for a little over six years but has experienced her fair share of interesting calls. "We get every kind of call you could imagine. Bomb threats and attempted suicides reported, people asking how to wash a shirt, what day a holiday falls on, when grades will be out. We can always tell when a full moon is coming, because the calls get even stranger."

"People will call and ask about a professor that hasn't worked here in ten years," says Dorothy. "But we remember them. We know all of the old names of the buildings, who was head of what department five years ago."

The women are a family; they disagree, laugh a lot, console each other, tease each other. They fondly reminisce about the old days at UMass. Formal dances, homecoming parades, Ray Charles performing at the Cage. They remember Southwest being built, they remember UMass before the budget problems, when it was rising in the ranks of top quality state schools.

"We have given hundreds of sets of directions, guarded vats of chicken blood for the veterinary science department, delivered lost foreign exchange students to their residence halls, kept lost suitcases safe for their owners," recalls Jean. "We recommend hotels, tell people calling long-distance what the weather is like, answer questions about concerts and home games. We know, all, hear all, tell all."

The system has changed through the years, from plugboards to computers, but the voices are still there at the other end of the line.

Guns don't kill - the Dismembered Animal Fairy does

Shawn MacDonnell

Today I'd like to present a special column, dedicated to all those readers who have found dismembered heads on their front lawn, next to the massive wooden flower pot from Mother's Day, 1973. I'm sure you all remember the first time this happened to you. For me, it was the about two years ago, a chilly day in October, when I noticed my brother Bryan in the yard, prodding something with his foot.

"Look," he cried out in a voice filled with child-like wonder. "A head!"

Now before anyone starts accusing me of shamelessly lying, or making light of decapitation, let me just say that, legally, that head had every right to be in our yard. It was the head of a deer, which had apparently been given to us by our neighborhood hunters, as a token of their appreciation. "Thank you," it seemed to say, "for letting countless alcoholics prowl around your backyard looking for adventure, armed with enough portable weaponry to overthrow an unstable government."

Perhaps you know the individuals I am referring to. Their sworn purpose in life is to move closer to nature, in all of it's colorful, animal-infested grandeur, and help stem the tide of wildlife overpopulation. Or, simply put, to go into the woods and kill things.

Never mind that New England doesn't have any wildlife overpopulation — these hardy adventurers are not to be stopped by anything so inconsequential as logic. They are knights on a quest. They are killers on the prowl. They are drunk on light beer.

Sure, some skeptic may be won over with claims that bears are dangerous animals which need to be put in their place (the den, above the mantle) but it is usually more difficult to convince these same people that foxes threaten the foundation of an independent, democratic society, or that deer are bloodthirsty carnivores who'd just as soon kill you as look at you.

I myself have never had any trouble with deer — save the dead ones on my yard — and although I was once bitten by a rather vicious llama at Benson's Animal Farm, this does not mean on I would look with any more approval on attempts to "de-populate" llamas from South America.

When I last checked the facts — after the first appearance of deer pieces — I learned that the last hunting fatality had taken place just one week previous. I also learned that the last animal to kill a man in New England was a bear, in the 17th century.

I'm sure you've heard all the reports of drunken hunters aiming guns at people's midsections, or wandering into backyards and killing dogs or cats. I myself have been several times blessed by hunters who decided mine was the perfect yard in which to hurl various unwanted animal parts, before running back to the truck for more Schlitz.

Fun as it is to trip over disembodied limbs on your way to the car in the morning, there are certain considerations not to be overlooked. For instance, finding someplace to put said limbs before they attract a colony of flies the size of Rhode Island. I remember with particular fondness one afternoon when I managed to dispose of the head and legs of a deer, which the Dismembered Animal Fairy had left the night before, only to have my dog Scooter (literally, "dumb as granite") disinter them and try and take them in the house.

So, while some folks suggest the hunters, nuisances that they are, must nevertheless be tolerated and allowed the freedom to do as they want, I fell I must dissent. I don't wish to deny any basic freedoms here, but rather insist on the freedom to exist in a world relatively free of gunshot wounds or unwanted carcasses landing on the deck at two in the morning, with a reverberating "splud." Call me an idealist.

And while you fully-evolved readers out there think about the gross lack of enforced restrictions on hunters, you hunters can ask yourselves whether the wildlife you pretend to love so much can continue to withstand the barrage of drunken gunsmen that defile it every fall. Those of you, that is, who were unable to unfold the paper.

There is no restoring a species gone extinct, or replacing a loved one — even a pet. There is beauty in a nature that is dead, and no hope for a society which allows bloody-faced killers to stalk it's woods, unchecked and unrestricted.

There is also no trash service that will willingly remove deer parts, no matter how tightly you tie the bag.

A note from the cartoonist

Barry Deutsch

My editor at the Collegian just called to tell me that a storm is brewing over this past Friday's Cast of Thousands, and asked me if I could write some sort of explanation or apology. Hesitantly, I agreed; hesitantly, because nothing ruins a joke so thoroughly as explaining it.

I agreed, in this case, because I respect the people who object to Friday's strip. They are people who see something wrong and try to correct it; they are attempting to improve the world they live in, which is certainly admirable.

Nevertheless, I think that they have misread Friday's strip.

Of course Zack's speech is racist. I realize that; Albert [his roommate] realized that, hence his sarcastic "Imagine my joy" in the last panel. Like myself, and like most Americans from an upper-class white suburban background, Zack attended a racist public school — not often blatantly so (we're all too liberal and educated for separate bathrooms these days), but racist in that, besides all the pious anti-racist sayings the almost all-white faculty recited to the almost all-white student body, the few black students were never really accepted by the rest of the school.

Like many a liberal, white student from a liberal, white town — and like the towns themselves —Zack has a nasty racist streak hidden not far beneath the surface. I don't like that racist streak, and so I decided to point it out and make fun of it.

Some people will criticize my decision to make one of the characters racist at all. I think these people have a different idea of what a comic strip should be than I do. At the risk of sounding pretentious, I consider myself an artist, and have ambitions for Cast of Thousands beyond producing an innocuous gag every day. I don't want to do a strip about bland, morally perfect characters; if I did that, how could the characters grow?

So I do not apologize. I am dismayed, however, that my work has distressed the very people whose politics most resemble my own. In any case, I hope that everyone will continue to read my work and continue to let it be known when they feel I've screwed up. I plan to be here for a while and can only improve.

Generalizations do disservice to reputation of the University

I am responding to the two-part series Jared Blaut wrote on the "life of the UMass student." It is hard for me to believe that Jared Blaut is a UMass student from the opinions he expressed on September 23.

I am constantly fighting the negative reputation that my school has to people outside the University. I do not understand why a UMass student, of his own free will, would decide to insult every UMass student repeatedly in his own newspaper. Jared Blaut, I hope that you have included yourself in these generalizations. I am not sure where you have spent your time at UMass, but either you are extremely pessimistic or one incident in college has marred you for life.

I hope you are playing devil's advocate. I hope that you realize that your views are very ignorant. With my most generous estimation, I believe your articles are supposed to get UMass students so upset that they combat these negative opinions and take pride in their school. If that was not the goal of these columns, then I suggest you look beyond your narrow views.

Your first article about the intelligence level of the average UMass student was disgusting. The majority of people at UMass are fairly intelligent, not Putzius Majoris as your second column suggests. Mr. Blaut, do you realize that there are not-so-intelligent people at Harvard as well? Perhaps their father's golf buddy was on the admissions board.

We are not doomed to skid row as UMass students. There is one quality that every person who attends this University learns — independence. There is no hand holding at UMass.

Not only did your second article offend me as a UMass student, it offended me as a member of the Greek area. Greeks constantly battle the negative attitudes that people who are not part of the Greek Area perpetuate. You criticize the Greek Area for their drinking and superficiality. As the saying goes, you cannot see an entire house by just looking through a window. There's more to the Greek Area than you can see by just walking down "Frat Row." I think perhaps if you went through rush you would have a different outlook. You know how one bad apple ruins the bunch? That will forever be the case in the Greek Area.

I don't believe that there are only two types of UMass students, the drunk and the nerd. Your generalization shows that you have not opened your eyes in the time you have spent here. There are winners and losers in every environment. UMass is the real world, Jared.

Take pride in the University of Massachusetts. We fight enough negative comments from people outside this University. The last place we need to see more of this misrepresentation is in our own college newspaper. We do not need to fight fellow students as well.

Capitalism or democracy first?

At the recent Five College discussion panel on Soviet politics September 16, Professor William Taubman, in relating the events that led up to the coup, characterized the Soviet Union as undergoing three revolutions - political, economic, and imperial. He went on to say that the fact that these revolutions occurred simultaneously largely explains the current disarray which prevents the orderly transformation of the former Soviet Union into a capitalist democracy.

Although not elaborated on in the discussion, this leads us to the question: given the nature of capitalist democracy, which should come first in Russia, capitalism or democracy?

Let us look at the nature of capitalist democracy. Briefly, the political system naturally comes to be organized along the same lines as the economic one - a hierarchy of capitalists, managers, and labor. Leaving the day-to-day operation to the political managers, capitalists control the political system much the way they would a corporation - by hiring and firing managers, setting general policy direction, and supplying or withdrawing capital.

Consider the U.S. for example. The fact is that in the U.S. all the elements of democracy are financed and controlled by capitalists - elections, policy formulation, and the media. The term "capitalist democracy" should be taken quite literally. If one has the financial resources, the system offers many opportunities for political involvement.

However, the situation for the rest of the population is dramatically different: low voter turnout in elections, candidates who refuse to address public concerns, generally uninformed voters, no independent media, a lack of popular-based political organizations, a public education system that does not even bother to teach the principles of self-government, etc.

This is all perfectly natural, because a capitalist system cannot function properly unless the political role of the public has been minimized. The prescribed role is to compete on a regional basis for the favors of the capital.

With regard to Russia, it seems clear that the very nature of capitalist democracy dictates that capitalism must come first, presumably under an autocratic regime that can insure the safety of the market, until capital is ready to take the reins. Note that all this is implicit in discussions of bringing capitalist democracy to Russia.

But first the forces of popular democracy must be rolled back. Will the Russian people maintain the struggle to keep their newly gained political freedom? Or will they, too, come to believe that justice and equality are the opiate of the people?

Poet Creely gives energetic reading

By ROBIN CRANDALL
Collegian Correspondent

His poetry chills me; I have goose bumps all over my body. An avid reader of modern poetry, I decided to check out Robert Creely's work before I went to see him Thursday night. The first poem I discovered, "Air: The Love Of A Woman", whirled my senses with the sight of hair, the feel of an aura, the visceral melancholy over the loss of a love. Nothing, however, could prepare me for Robert Creely in person reading his poetry as it sounded to him.

Last Thursday night in Memorial Hall, we gathered around him at the podium — some on fold out chairs, some on the floor with bare feet and anticipatory smiles. The room wasn't large enough to contain all of it: the audience, the poet, the energy.

I was surprised by his appearance, although I'm not sure why because I knew nothing about him. At 65, his hair is still dark, yet his beard is tinged with grey. He had a nervous gesture, or just a gesture, of running his hand through his thin hair. His voice was strong, though not loud, and he made us laugh. He read for about 45 minutes (it seemed like only five) and told us tales in between about friends, and life, and growing old. He is a lover and a reveller of life.

And what a life! Born in Arlington, Massachusetts in 1926, Creely, along with being a dedicated writer, was also a chicken farmer and an ambulance driver. He did his undergraduate work at Harvard and received a Master's from the University of New Mexico. He now resides and teaches in Buffalo, N.Y. Amidst his readings the other night, there were many hints of Massachusetts, and he admits that there is no place like it.

Nightcrawlers: blues talk

By KLAUS GAUGER
Collegian Correspondent

The Nightcrawlers, a local blues band of five musicians, were not under a lucky star when they decided to arrange their next concert at The Hatch for last Thursday. At the same time the graduate lounge gave a free party with two rock-n-roll bands providing the musical background, and so the five players had to face a near to empty hall with only some blues afficionados and some beer-drinking nightcrawlers hanging out.

In any event, this was not a big challenge for these guys, who proved from the very first moment a good share of self-confidence, humor, professional ease and willingness to play for the music's sake, each of them with every inch a clearly defined, mature musical personality: Piano player Dick Amberman on his electric organ with a full, round, Hammond-like sound, was making use of the whole organ tradition from easy-to-follow, accompanying chords down to rhythmic, accentuated blues riffs and quick, jazzlike runs a la Jimmy Smith.

Guitarist Leif Laudamus, on both his Gibson and his vibrant, warm-toned Fender, was mostly concerned with producing the necessary rhythm guitar patterns. On top of this he gave expertise as a soloist, particularly when creating long, beautiful melodic lines on slow blues ballads.

Tom Kubasick gave clear evidence of his skills in supplying a dense, well-audible bass foundation, while Richard Glashow served convincingly the basic 4/4 blues groove on his drums. Both formed an ideal rhythm section in their cautious, reserved way of listening and supporting the soloists.

The front man and most charismatic member of the band, Thomas Mayor, has undeniable qualities as a singer, especially in low passages. He is also an outstanding harmonica player with a transparent, well tuned tone. He combined "dirty" growling and hollering sounds with trumpet-like, long, well-considered lines. On slide guitar his style is clearly more rock-oriented than Laudamus', providing the band with a contemporary, modern touch.

The Nightcrawlers played mostly Chicago style, urban blues, under the audible influence of musicians like Muddy Waters, Sonny Boy Williamson and John Lee Hooker. Some songs they performed sounded beautifully stunning, poignant and swinging, like Lazy Lester's "Sugarcoated Love" or Muddy Waters' "Hoochie Coochie Man." With the latest song the band luckily avoided the distortion and demolition often enough done to it by rough handed rock bands.

Later, in an interview, Laudamus said "My approach is to go back to the original and then, after seriously listening to all the versions, try to bring something new out of it, to make it sound fresh, new. Blues is something spiritual, and the best way to get in contact with that feeling is by listening to the original version, to the old masters, trying to find out how they did it."

Laudamus, who has earned an Ph.D. in Musicology and is something like the intellectual head of the band, speaks for a whole generation of blues enthusiasts when he tells about his experiences: "I was deeply influenced by this music when I was fifteen, sixteen years old, an age when you are easy to impress. The late sixties were a very intensive time . It was violent, radical, divided between right wing and left wing, and I was definitely of the left wing side. Blues was a part of it, a way to express my feelings."

"Later," he continued, "I studied classical music at the University of Pennsylvania — a good graduate school — but there were things about the system that made me angry. In the whole record library of the music department only one jazz album made by Art Tatum could be found. All the famous jazz and blues musicians should stand in one library together with Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart. It's all great. Good music is good music, whether white or black."

Singer Mayor, who is more on the charismatic, introverted side, shares Laudamus's opinions when affirming that "blues gives you much more freedom than playing commercial pop-stuff. Most of it is totally prearranged and only aiming to the charts. Blues is demanding, serious music."

All the band members come from a different musical and social background. Thomas is the only professional musician; all the others are semiprofessionals. Bass player Kubasick is still a graduate student, while piano player Amberman is a fifty year-old painter. "It was not easy to get the band together," Laudamus remarks. "It was hard for me to get into it again. There is so much 'personality crap' in the whole business. Too many people just don't care about the music. You need a lot of time and and strong nerves until you get the thing working."

Blues is their common denominator, and the music that holds them together.

Drummer Glashow speaks for them all when he says: "I have nearly thirty years of musical experience as a drummer. I have been playing a lot of old-fashioned rock-n-roll and dance music. Nothing was as satisfying as this band. Of course I would like to make some more money too, but you won't do that playing blues. But playing blues is really fun."

And it is not only fun for the five musicians, it is also fun for the audience, listening to them. Hopefully more people will find their way to one of their concerts next time.

Death of a nation: conference to kill Palestine

George Bush has a vision of the future. It makes the Middle East the cornerstone of the Pax Americana now emerging across the planet, securing indefinite control of the oil fields of the region for the unfettered use of the North. And it most certainly does not include the possibility of a Palestinian state.

The first step in recolonizing the Arab world was the crushing of its only genuinely revolutionary government, Iraq; a threat because it had too much dignity, because it could be neither bought with the carrot nor cowed by the stick, and because it was developing its technological capacity in an unacceptable manner. Clearly, any Third World nation with dignity and technology instantly becomes the latest pariah, "worse than Hitler."

Having committed an ongoing genocide against the Iraqi people, reducing them to a 19th century lifestyle (although still failing to remove its dignity), the U.S. looks to the so-called "Middle East peace conference," as the next step. But it is not to be a conference, and will certainly produce no lasting "peace."

Americans understand the danger of "instability" in the Middle East as the great threat to their ownership of the area. Thus it is clear that all revolutionary elements and forces of change must be co-opted or destroyed. With the incapacity of the Iraqis to move under the colonial jackboot, this brings to the fore those old nagging details, the Palestinians. There seems little doubt that the United States and its proxies and employees in the area have decided to once and for all rid the region of this irritating people, who dare to fight for their human and national rights.

To that end, the final stage in the destruction of Palestine, begun by the infamous Balfour Declaration, is well under way. Hence the cannibalistic "conference", beginning with a day of empty speeches, followed by isolated talks between Israel and Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan respectively.

Since Syria controls the Lebanese government, and nobody pays any attention to Jordan anyway, the only real negotiations will be with Syria. The representatives of the Palestinians, the PLO, obviously must be banned from the deliberation of their fate. A few Palestinians of no power, influence, or credibility, selected from a tiny percentage of the population, may be tagged onto the irrelevant Jordanian delegation, as long as Israel likes them.

Palestinians, in effect excluded from the talks altogether, are to be presented with a fait accompli, and told "here is your future, take it or leave it." Here's the plan: Israel and Syria make some kind of compromise on the Golan Heights involving partial return of land, or more likely, demilitarization, and formalize the division of Lebanon into zones of indefinite occupation. Both get lots of cash, Israel gets weapons, and Syria gets access to power, from the U.S. Palestinians will be offered a kind of utterly worthless limited autonomy that amounts at most to deciding who gets to collect the garbage on Monday night. Settlements leading to eventual annexation, Israeli control over resources, and land seizures will continue, as will the occupation in all its primary forms. Their right to return home will continue to be denied and Israeli apartheid will intensify. Meanwhile Palestinian resistance based in Arab states will be crushed, primarily by Syria. Fateh will be destroyed, assassinations and massacres will follow.

Eventually, if necessary, Jordan can be destroyed and a preposterous mutant "Palestinian state" can be formed there, probably after the annexation of the West Bank and Gaza, the last part of Palestine still uncolonized. And it is this colonization process that is issue, for the U.S. is asking the Israelis to wait.

The process of colonizing the Occupied Territories is based on the settling of hundreds of thousands of Russians on seized Arab lands in the Occupied Territories. The problem for Israel ever since it conquered the territories in the war it started for that purpose in 1967, has been that it has been unwilling to withdraw from what it considers an integral part of "Greater Israel", but has also been unable to annex it without incorporating millions of Palestinians into the Zionist state. Having large numbers of Arabs living in any part of Palestine has always been the greatest threat to the Zionist ambition of removing indigenous Palestinian people from their homes and replacing them with colonists. It is the historical pattern for the Zionists to first seize the land and expel Palestinians, and only then find the colonists to take over their homes and farms.

Hussein Ibish

Since 1967, the Israelis had "bitten off" more than they could swallow in one gulp. They wanted the land without the people, but they had no one to live in it. Hence, the occupation, the Intifada, etc. Now, with the Soviet economic and social collapse, millions of Russians are emigrating. Israel sees in them the chance to finally settle the last part of Palestine, that it has been holding, praying for a flood of colonists from somewhere. To that end the US and other preferred destinations have been pressured by the Israelis not to accept them, forcing them to go to Israel. Once in Israel the idea is to use them as a demographic weapon to settle seized land, change the population balance in the Israeli favor, and drive Palestinians out by using up resources and taking over their jobs, and eventually annexing the land.

Housing Minister Ariel Sharon, one of the greatest terrorists in modern history and colonist-in-chief, is in charge of this project. Settlement activity has become frantic, especially in occupied Arab East Jerusalem. Israel's U.S. Ambassador Shoval has described this Russian influx as a "holy miracle," that suggests the immanent appearance of the messiah.

But while they may in the end be willing to go along with everything Israel wants, the US and its proxies are embarrassed by this blatant colonial activity. Arab public opinion is the most serious threat to US domination. It must be kept quiescent, for now at least. It is important for those who would destroy Palestine on the Arab side, such as the Saudis, to pretend that they are actually looking after the interests of Palestine. Therefore a freeze on settlements would make life easier for the other parties as they engage in this stage of the destruction of Palestine. Essentially, the Israelis are being told, "let us formalize the betrayal of the Palestinians by the Arab regimes and the total control of the region by the U.S. After that you may resume colonization, replace and remove Palestinians, and annex the whole thing. But you will have to wait."

This is the essence of the quarrel between Israel and the US over the extra $10 billion that they are demanding in loan guarantees, on top of $5.6 billion in outright gifts, as well as $1 billion each in "philanthropy" and commercial loans, in this fiscal year alone. It's not that the U.S. objects to colonization and annexation, or paying for it, but it feels that the time is not right and that there is much more to be gained from playing down the settlements for now. Were Israel to freeze settlements, they could have the $10 billion and more tomorrow. And besides, the US has ruled out a Palestinian state. The vision-thing calls for a continued Israeli control of all of Palestine.

Amazingly enough, however, the Israeli government seems to have reached such a state of hysteria and advanced paranoia that it is unwilling to facilitate American and canine-Arab efforts that are essentially on their behalf. They seem unable to restrain themselves in their drive for unencumbered expansion, the lust for finally swallowing the last morsel of Palestine irresistible.

And so we have the spectacle, unheard of in international relations, of a small, dependant client state that owes existence, economic viability, and future to its ultra-generous patron, berating and abusing that patron for no sane reason. The rest of the world shakes its head in disbelief, as the U.S., struggles mightily to get the Israelis on board the program that will make their wildest dreams and evilest schemes come true, only to be repeatedly spat upon. The Israelis may have overplayed their hand with Caeser himself, but the congressional genuflection continues unabated. Israel will get its money, and get its way.

And in the end Israel will almost certainly see the wisdom of the American plan to bury Palestine in a slightly more indirect way. And for Palestinians, this is nothing but more of the same. For this entire despicable century they have been the victims of countless plots, betrayals, massacres, and have seen their nation destroyed. Those involved in this plan may have the finalization of this process in mind, for if nothing else, few can live with the genuinely revolutionary Palestinian spirit. But it is this force of will, strength of character, and purity of ideology, of Palestinians wherever they may be, that gives the lie to such a vile plot. And, like me, there are millions of people who will never accept peace without justice, conference or no conference.

The vision is an illusion.

South Africa: the turbulent course of apartheid

They came by the hundreds and then thousands, in two great swarms, to settle and govern. Dutch settlers and British imperialists, members of the European colonial wolfpack, in search of command outposts and then minerals.

They died by the tens of thousands, the indigenous Khoikhoi and San tribes — first through butchery, and then by disease. Until they too joined the ranks of the victims of Europe's successful acts of genocidal extinction.

They were subjugated by the hundreds of thousands, the indigenous Nguni, Sotho and Tswana tribes, through warfare, dispossession, and treachery.

They were brought by the tens of thousands, slaves from other parts of Africa and indentured laborers from India.

From this arose one of the most obscene forms of institutionalized racial domination in an obdurate Europe in Africa, defying much of the world.

From the beginning, racial relations in South Africa were marred by the deep-rooted desire of the Dutch to seclude themselves from the "inferior" Blacks. Even though they began to call themselves "Afrikaners" and spoke "Afrikaans," the settlers felt no identification with the indigenous African people.

The British, arriving about two centuries later, brought with them modern technology which ushered in Africa's only full-fledged industrial revolution, built its most powerful economy, and broke the back of its first anti-colonial movement.

Fearful of being swamped by the majority Black population and having their racial purity diluted, Afrikaners devised a grotesque theological and political program of separation. Inhuman laws were defined to control the amount of racial interaction in almost every aspect of life, enforced by a ruthless military machine.

In keeping with the modern Western trend of not publicly practicing racism, apartheid underwent subtle refinements. The euphemism "University Education Extension Act" came to describe segregation in universities. Even "apartheid" was replaced by doublespeak like "separate freedoms" and "separate development."

Of course, the fact that 75 percent of the Blacks were dumped on 13 percent of the most unproductive land, in which their "self-government" was dictated by the Afrikaners, did not matter.

Madanmohan Rao

Another northern development, this time with major consequences, was the end of colonialism in Africa in 1974, with the ouster of Portugal. To the apartheid regime, it meant the loss of the northern buffer of white-ruled colonies, and a dangerous morale boost to the South African anti-apartheid uprising.

Displaying its characteristic lack of support to Third World liberation movements, the United States, whose interests till then were being amicably served by the white-minority governments, persuaded South Africa to block alleged Soviet threats in Angola.

South Africa, with aid and collaboration from its cousin Israel and the CIA, aggressively destabilized its neighbors. It drove Mozambique into economic ruin, and murdered 100,000 of its citizens. Mines strewn all over Angola left it with the world's highest amputee rate. A coup in Lesotho installed a puppet regime.

It was in Angola that South Africa was finally routed, with Cuban assistance ultimately leading to the independence of Namibia in 1990. It was apartheid's first defeat by Black nationalism.

The Western media turned a blind eye to both this and the recent grand betrayal of Black South Africa. It is now more occupied with the dramatic decaying of the Soviet corpse.

Because as far as the West is concerned, all is fine in South Africa. President de Klerk's so-called reforms have been intentionally cosmetic, a brilliant public relations gimmick for a hypocritical Western audience. The West argues that the minority white regime has demonstrated a genuine commitment to change, despite its funding of the Inkatha-led destabilization campaign.

Power is also being decentralized to local councils which institute new apartheid laws, or simply refuse to follow federal directives. The government, winking at the racism, defends itself as a mere bystander. The Population Registration Act, the cornerstone of apartheid, is repealed — but only for newly born persons, all other racial classifications being maintained.

Land reform is hollow and meaningless when most of the worthwhile land is already owned by the whites, and when willing sellers are not to be found. There is no plan to redress the economic damage done under apartheid regulations and no plan to return those who were uprooted to their homes.

Nelson Mandela's release from prison (where he was unjustly put in the first place), the fraudulent constitutional plan, and the increase in access to some beaches and hot water swimming pools may win the applause of the West, but those struggling daily under the yoke of apartheid are scarcely impressed.

Atrocities instigated by white right-wingers and the attitudes espoused by hard-liners are neither acknowledged nor castigated by the de Klerk regime, because they seem to embody the unsaid sentiments of the majority of Afrikaners. Some even advocate the creation of a separate state for the whites, who will maintain the bulk of their empire and its associated machinery.

In reality, apartheid is not being razed to the ground; a bit of the scaffolding is being removed, but the edifice of apartheid is already solidly in place. To take it apart will be economic suicide for the Afrikaners.

The West's self-serving hypocrisy is clearly revealed by the remarkable ease with which they were convinced that apartheid was indeed being dismantled, and lifted sanctions. The West has never been truly committed to the rights of Black South Africans; sanctions were reluctantly imposed to salve its guilt at supporting an overtly racist regime.

As the African National Congress, Pan African Congress, the South African Communist Party, and others engage in an uphill crusade to banish apartheid, some fundamental truths emerge.

Firstly, the Afrikaners are now an uneradicable part of the fabric of the country. They command a mighty economic empire and a daunting military machine, which they will bitterly defend.

Secondly, Black South Africans must come to terms with their own ethnic rivalries; South Africa belongs to them all.

Finally, they can expect little support from the West other than empty lipservice, a mild interest in Mandela T-shirts, and plagiarization of their township music.

In the ongoing battle between the architects of apartheid and their victims, for all South Africans, the worst is yet to come.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Job dissatisfaction could make you think about quitting. You will probably do better by staying put, so adopt a new attitude. Bring thoughts and feelings into clearer focus. Your willpower is legendary.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Do not let recent romantic disappointment sour you. An irresistible newcomer will enter your life soon! Be more practical about financial matters. Wishful thinking can lead you down the garden path.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Do not jump off into the unknown. Your regular work provides a safe haven. Make the best of improved conditions to obtain better credit. Private talks prove to be very profitable.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Tighten up on overhead and other costs if they are getting out of hand. Deception is possible in negotiations. Accept a friendly offer only after you have made all the necessary checks.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Welcome an opportunity to meet new people or join a fraternal or social organization. Take stock of neglected chores. You need to clear them away before beginning another project. Make long-range plans.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept. 22): Keep digging away at the things that hamper progressive thought and action. Extend a helping hand to others this evening. A special celebration could be on your agenda. Wear something elegant.

LIBRA: (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Put your best foot foward if you want to impress friends and strangers alike. Do not allow yourself to be used by a pressure group. Romance will smile at you this week.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21): The spotlight is on money—income, outgo, and commercial operations. This is not a good time to invest in ventures controlled by others. Avoid trying to mix business with pleasure this evening.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Continue to be conservative when it comes to money. Salvaging old equipment will help pare costs. Distance yourself from a loved one's on-going relationship battles.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do not try to buck the system at home or work today. Loved ones are in no mood to compromise. You will gain nothing but confusion by indulging in wishful thinking. Be practical.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Consult experts or publications on a special field if looking for a job opening. Saving cash for a rainy day is very wise. Give loved ones more TLC. They need your encouragement!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A loved one or good friend may need extra emotional support now. It is up to you to be understanding. Offer practical assistance to someone down on their luck. A dream proves prophetic.

Assistant Athletic director Elaine Sortino explained that a joint effort of administrators and coaches is making a "grass-roots effort" to bring the same colors and team names to UMass sports.

There are several considerations, Sortino explained, which make the process a slow, careful one. From color dye lots — UMass is officialy "PMS 201," which is somewhere between crimson and maroon — to a suitable name that covers all teams without excluding or offending, UMass has a long road ahead before one school, one emblem, one color becomes a reality.

Women's soccer once wore red uniforms, hence popularizing their name. A quick trip to lower Boyden for the Minutewomen's game with Central Florida last Saturday saw the women wearing "PMS 201" instead of the familiar red duds.

I think this is an idea whose time has come. With UMass athletics doing well on the whole, it's important that fans and the media can identify with UMass quickly and easily.

But I wouldn't change too much. Keep the "Minute-person" nickname, for starters. Some would have you believe that it's sexist and violent, but I don't agree. First of all, there were in fact women who participated in the Revolutionary War effort, so there is such a thing as a "Minutewoman."

Secondly, no other college or university in the nation besides UMass has a Minuteman or a Minutewoman as a mascot. My brother attends Villanova, and even though his school is better-known than UMass is, he complains about the mundaneness of the "Wildcat" mascot.

"Do you know how many schools have a "Wildcat?", he asked me. "UMass is great because they have such a unique nickname."

Standardization also helps in one crucial aspect of college sports — marketing. You see Syracuse and Duke and Michigan and Miami and Georgetown gear all over the place, but do you ever see UMass anywhere besides the U-store? Not very often.

When John Calipari's crew makes the NCAA tournament, when the field hockey and women's soccer teams win national titles — all very realistic and possible goals, by the way — UMass will become better-known. It would serve the school well if it could cash in on the financially lucrative licensing business. Only with a standard nickname or nicknames could UMass reap these benefits.

"You're unbelievable:" I saw it with my own eyes and still I couldn't believe it. There was Greg McMurtry, New England Patriots receiver, taking a Matt Millen pass over the middle and running the ball in for a touchdown with five seconds left on the clock.

Patriots 24, Houston Oilers 20. Bookmakers everywhere scream with delight as the "safest bet in football" — take the opposition and the points against New England — turns into a major fiscal windfall.

Well, don't I look and feel dumb. No I didn't bet — I never bet as a rule — but all those derisive things I said about the Pats just blew up in my face.

You know the lines. "Hey, let's go to the Patriots game! Seats should be plentiful." A quick crowd shot of Sunday's contest showed zero available seats. Wow. What will they do for a winner?

Another of my Pats jokes still holds some water, however. "I got Patriots season tickets for next year! But I can't afford air fare to Jacksonville."

The franchise's fiscal problems are mounumental. With the spectre of a team sale hanging over Foxboro like a meanspirited town council that won't allow night games, one wonders how much longer the Patriots will stick around. Stay tuned. Meanwhile, I'll be crossing my fingers when my Bills visit the Stadium.

And I won't bet the spread, either.

UMass has already played four teams in the top 20 nationally, with many more top 20 teams on the schedule. The team's continued success will largely depend on her.

Coach Pam Hixon said earlier this year, "She's solid. She's made the saves she had to make."

Stick notes: UMass pulled a double play in awards this week, as sophomore Jenn Salisbury picked up the A-10 offensive player of the week. She had a hat trick Sunday and has 10 goals this year.

UMass spends another week looking up at Old Dominion, who remains number one in the country. Old Dominion comes to Amherst on October 5th, which will be the game of the year for the Minutewomen.

Women's soccer boots Lady Vikings, 3-0

By DAVID SCOTT
Collegian Staff

The combination of junior Holly Hellmuth and sophomore Paula Wilkins led the University of Massachusetts over the Salem State College Lady Vikings 3-0, in women's soccer action yesterday.

In a peculiar matchup, the 11th-ranked Division I Minutewomen outplayed and outhustled the sixth-ranked Division III Lady Vikings on the power of two goals from Hellmuth (raising her team-leading point total to eight), both notched on passes from Wilkins. Wilkins added a penalty kick to up her season point total to five.

"I'm proud to say I recruited both of them," said coach Jim Rudy, whose team upped its record to 4-1. "They're at a good level [of play] right now. One's a great server and one's a great header."

Hellmuth's first goal came at 24:24 of the first half on a corner kick from Wilkins.

"At least I don't have to be in the crowd," laughed Wilkins after the game describing the set-up.

Salem State goalie Viki Hernandez, who had allowed only one goal in her previous 210 minutes of play, stopped eight shots but was left shaking her head after Hellmuth's next gem.

Less than two minutes later Wilkins had another corner kick which Hellmuth deftly headed past Hernandez to round out the scoring for the first half.

UMass goalie Brianna Scurry saved five while recording her third shutout of the season. The save of the day came at 17:23 of the second half, when Scurry fended off a high lofting shot from Salem's Allison Chamrin.

Scurry timed her jump exactly right and deflected the ball over the crossbar and behind the net.

"[That shot's] often in on most goalies," said Rudy of his sophomore goalkeeper. "It's a typical save for her and she can do it time and time again. Just another day on the job for her."

After the game Rudy stressed the importance of having a home game before three on the road, and also downplayed the fact that Salem State was a Division III school.

"They're stronger than a lot of Division I teams we've seen," Rudy said. "Tactically it was really good for us learning to deal with the off-side trap."

A trap that Rudy said UMass's last opponent, Central Florida, didn't use very effectively.

Wilkins left the game early with UMass ahead by three to nurse a sore left ankle.

UMass will travel to Fairfax, Virginia on Saturday for a game against George Mason University.

ZooMass' endangered species

Whatever happened to the "Reds?"

Lately I've noticed that the women's soccer team has been known by the more official school monicker, the Minutewomen.

Greg Sukiennik

What prompted this change? A dislike for the baseball Reds of Cincinnati, perhaps? The fall of communism in the Soviet Union?

Actually there's a move afoot to try and standardize UMass' overall identity, including athletics, and that involves bringing team names and uniform colors under one heading. Hence, no more Reds or in the case of lacrosse, no more Gorillas.

Tennis drops second straight

Team falls to 1-3 with latest defeat to Central Conn.

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

Central Connecticut coach Craig O'Brien best summarized his team's punishing victory over UMass (1-3) yesterday: "We came in here with all our guns firing."

Indeed, the Blue Devils (1-2) were right on target yesterday, capturing the match in singles competition alone, winning five of six matches, just as the University of Connecticut had done against the Minutemen last Tuesday.

But yesterday's loss was even tougher, as UMass managed to win only one set in singles competition. The only player to win a set was Tim Lipsky, who continues to be the lone bright spot for UMass. His match with Jeff Russell was in a third set at the time of publication, tied at a set apiece.

However, as the other five singles matches had gone to Central Connecticut, the result of Lipsky's match would be of no consequence. Lipsky is 3-0 on the season.

First singles continues to be a problem for the Minutemen. In their four matches, UMass' top singles player has not won a match. Yesterday, Lloyd Teitlebaum (who won his first match of the year and was promoted to first singles) fell quickly to Mike Phillips, 6-0, 6-1.

"Last year [Phillips] played [third singles] and he didn't lose a set the whole season. He's improved a lot since last September," O'Brien said, making a clear indication of Phillips' talent.

In third singles, Blue Devil Jerry Albrikes had little trouble with UMass captain Paul Audet, beating him 6-2, 6-1.

Minuteman Len Levine could not turn around a winless season in fourth singles as he lost again, this time to Chris Easdon, 6-1, 6-4.

Central Conn's John Melesko topped Keith Murray, 6-3, 6-4, in fifth singles.

In sixth singles, Steve Davis could not quite capture his first varsity win, as he was bested by Chris Fitzgerald, 6-4, 7-5. Despite the loss, Davis was somewhat pleased with his performance.

"That was my best match of the season," he said.

Only the first doubles match was played yesterday, and it was taken by Teitlebaum and Audet, who stopped Phillips and Fitzgerald.

Men's soccer hoping to upset Dartmouth

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team is coming off a hard-earned, 1-1 tie with the Vermont Catamounts last Saturday, but the Minutemen will have their hands full again this afternoon when they meet the Dartmouth Big Green (4 p.m. at Lower Boyden Field).

Dartmouth was ranked No. 10 in a preseason, NCAA Division-I poll, but a tough loss at Wisconsin lowered their ranking. Their last match was a win over the University of Pennsylvania Sunday, which may give them momentum coming into today's match.

The biggest problem for UMass against Vermont was creating quality scoring opportunities. Vermont outshot UMass 28-13, and while UMass head coach Sam Koch felt that was "not that big a difference," he said, "We definitely want to create more [scoring] opportunities."

Koch also noted that Dartmouth is an especially strong defensive team, so generating more offense may be a tall order for UMass today.

"We want to move the ball quicker in the midfield," Koch said, "and think ahead a little better."

One thing the Minutemen can rely on is the outstanding goaltending of senior co-captain Jon Gruber. Gruber salvaged the tie with Vermont when he saved a penalty kick in the waning seconds of regulation. He made a total of 11 saves, including several on what were Vermont's surest scoring opportunities.

This is Koch's first season as UMass head coach, which follows a six-year stint as head coach of Stanford University. He is thoroughly enjoying his new position.

"The kids have been great. They have a lot of heart and desire. They're trying to adjust to a new program, and they're doing a great job," Koch said.

Another element that the Minutemen hope to have on their side today is fan support. An enthusiastic crowd turned out at Lower Boyden for Saturday's thriller, and Koch would like to see the same thing today.

"We'd like to see a lot of support," he said, "The kids play better with the fans behind them."

No. 2 field hockey goes for eight in a row

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

In field hockey, the only thing more frightening for opponents than a team on a roll is a goalie on a roll. The University of Massachusetts field hockey team is ranked second in the country for the second week in a row and goaltender Philippa Scott is a big reason why.

Scott, a junior from Corsham, England was named the Atlantic-10 defensive player of the week yesterday.

Scott, or "Scottie" as her teammates affectionately call her, is one of the hottest players in the country and her performance today in New Haven, Conn. could very likely determine the outcome of the game against Yale.

A goaltender in field hockey benefits greatly from a strong defense, but even the best of defenses occasionally breaks down, and those occasions give a goalie a chance to either put up or shut up.

Scott has put up. . . some monster statistics, and in this case, statistics don't lie. She registered three shutouts last week, and has only allowed two goals in 486 minutes. Her goals against average is 0.51, and she has recorded five shutouts.

As important as statistics are, they don't mean anything if the team doesn't have confidence in their goalie. In UMass' case, it's just the opposite. The Minutewomen have total confidence in Scott, and their style of play reflects it. The defense can play aggresively because if they get burned, Scott can and has made the difficult saves.

On the flip side, the offense doesn't have to press too hard, because they can count on her to keep opponents' scoring to a minimum.

Scott is such an asset to the team that it is easy to forget how good she is. The Minutewomen, however, are reminded when they look across the field. She has clearly outshined all of her adversaries this year, which is no small accomplishment.

Discussion diverse at free inquiry debate

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

Topics were wideranging at a standing-room only mulitculturalism debate moderated by Chancellor O'Brien and held last night in the Cape Cod Lounge.

What was named "Multiculturalism: Foe or Ally of Free Inquiry" became a diversified debate where only a few arguements appeared to follow the intended subject matter.

University of Massachusetts Professor William Strickland of the Afro-American Department spoke first. He quickly set the tone for the debate by questioning the reliability of common truths and noting a discrepancy between different views of American history.

Strickland mentioned the beating of Rodney King by Los Angeles police officers, informing the crowd of about 200 students and faculty that the number of civilians killed or wounded by the L.A.P.D. has decreased dramatically since the incident.

"How many here saw the results of the bombing in Baghdad? How many here saw the results of the the attack on Panama?" Strickland asked a silent crowd.

Strickland's opening remarks led the debate into a wider range of issues.

"We need to look into what is real, and not micro issues," he said.

Sociology Professor Paul Hollander spoke next, focusing on the educational implications of multiculturalism. He said cultural diversity on campus served more of a "political, ideological, and therapeutic" role, rather than improving education.

MArgaret Cerullo, professor of Social Sciences at Hampshire College, argued that multiculturalism was a vehicle for access to knowledge.

Cerullo pointed to a dramatic change in school curriculums since the sixties.

"I never read a woman writer in college," she said.

Cerullo opened a new theme in the debate by posing a question which reflected the discussion at hand.

"How should we study western civilization?" she asked. Much of the debate followed with references related to western literature — what should be studied, and the different educational settings this could be accom-

Weld supports funding for research efforts

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts is on a "sound financial footing" and can begin funding higher education and research efforts like the new University of Massachusetts computer center, Gov. William Weld said yesterday at a national computer conference held in Northampton.

Weld said state funding for higher education needs to be looked at with an eye to benefitting the economic health of Massachusetts.

"Funding for education is based not just on inputs, but on outputs," Weld said. "When we invest in education, we're not just investing in the quality of life of the individual receiving the education — we're making an investment in the state."

Weld and Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry gave the keynote addresses as part of the 7th annual "National Research Forum for Industry," a two-day conference held at the Hotel Northampton.

Government and academic leaders gathered yesterday to open the two day conference where they were to discuss the need for a partnership of the public and private sectors to help this state toward economic recovery.

The governor offically announced his support for a $300,000 state grant for the new computer center. The center is meant to incorporate academic talent, industrial resources and government funding.

The Center for Real-Time, Intelligent, Complex Computing Systems (CRICCS) will begin operations in October, focusing on combining computer science universities and industry researchers.

Both Weld and Kerry stressed the need for public/private cooperation to keep the Massachusetts economy competitive in the coming decades.

Gov. William Weld speaks at conference in Northampton

"We need to encourage the capacity for a larger vision to be implemented," Kerry said, speaking via satellite from Washington. "We especially need things such as the CRICCS system — if you take the link of the private sector to the university, you can put together the system to maximize the research that comes from those centers," Kerry said.

Weld said the potential offshoots from the CRICCS research could reap large benefits for the state's economy, noting that among the approximately 1,200 software companies in the state, many are "spin-offs from the University system and people who were unemployed or underemployed by larger companies.

"We ought to cash in on the fact we're a knowledge-based state," Weld said.

Weld added that he would give ex-

Watered-down reefer rally struggles on

By SARAH H. BOLFING
Collegian Correspondent

A joint effort between the Cannabis Action Network and the University of Massachusetts at Amherst Cannabis Reform Coalition was dampened, but not stifled by yesterday's rain.

Marijuana reform activists urged passing students to support the legalization of marijuanana even after their rally was cancelled due to the weather.

CAN and UMACRC hoped to educate students about the need for legal cultivation of marijuana. Instead, they passed out literature, collected signatures and sold everything from buttons to cookbooks.

Elvy Musikka, the first woman legally allowed to take marijuana for medicinal purposes was on hand to talk about her experience. She was the 37th person in the United States to be given this privilege.

Musikka's prescription, which she gets from her doctor in Florida, calls for one marijuana cigarette every three hours, or 10 per day. She believes conventional medicine ruined her eyesight when she was diagnosed with glaucoma over 15 years ago.

She was later given a prescription for marijuanna from an eye institute in Hollywood, Fla.

Musikka wants to make marijuanna legal so she can grow her own instead of having to go to her doctor.

"I want to be able to grow my own more potent stuff instead of the kind they give me which is all

A united residence hall stands behind 'gaybashing' victim

BY TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian staff

Sixty-two names fill a seven-by-four-foot poster outside openly gay senior Jeff McKeough's door on the first floor of Brown Residence Hall.

Jeff put up the poster in response to three weeks of homophobic harassment that included graffiti, late-nights knocks and insults, and one booby-trap that was unwittingly sprung by an RA.

President of Brown's House Council and a five semester resident, Jeff had never been harassed before this fall, although he says he is completely open about his sexuality.

Gaybashing in the dorms is a common occurrence, but McKeough's story has a dramatically uncommon ending. Members of his Residence Hall community vigorously and loudly rallied in his support. Workshops were held and residents signed a giant poster demanding the gaybashing in their community stop.

And the best part of this tale is that it did.

Services, House Council, the Residential Education staff and the Brown community as a whole."

Residential Director Kanthie Athakorala also praised Guentzel and her residential staff. "Melanie was wonderful. She did her role beyond the job description... We [Residential Education staff] definitely confronted the situation right on time."

Ossa praised McKeough and Guentzel's response to the harassment. "I think the RA on the floor and Jeff handled it very well. It could have easily been really negative, but they made it into something really positive."

McKeough said when the first sexual graffiti appeared on his door during the first week of school at first he thought it was a joke. He said someone wrote "I want to get laid" on his message board. He started to feel nervous when later in the night someone added "And I'm not a guy".

He said Guertzen, and two other Brown RA's talked him into filing a harassment report with the police. So he called them and went to wait in the lobby, leaving his suite door unlocked.

While he was waiting in the lobby for the officers McKeough said someone propped a 9-foot-long cardboard carpet roll insert inside his door so that it would hit the first person to enter. Ironically, according to McKeough it hit Denise Lane, an RA on fourth floor, on the head as she entered the room looking for him.

McKeough said other incidents occurred and the graffiti intensified after he filed a police report.

The next week "I want to get laid" appeared on his door again. McKeough says that time he didn't deal with it at all. "My week was totally stressful, I didn't want to deal with it again... I had the 'I hope it just goes away syndrome."

Then, around seven p.m. on September 15 McKeough

ence department to apply for federal matching funds to support CRICCS.

The CRICCS program has been in the works for the past three years, according to Karen Hayes, public relations manager for the UMass computer science department.

"We see industry nationwide being interested in collaborating with [CRICCS]," Hayes said. "A lot of spin-off companies have come in from the computer science department."

Hayes said much of the technology developed by the department is eventually exported for sale overseas, "generating a lot of revenue and jobs for the state."

Chancellor Richard O'Brien echoed Weld's theme, saying "that while the University's primary function is not to be the engine of the Commonwealth, we have a role to play.

"If we do it well, we deserve funding from the state," O'Brien said. "If we do it poorly, we don't deserve [funding]."

The Associated Press contributed to this article.

plished in.

University English Professor Arnold Silver named famous western writers and philosophers who were successful at questioning western values.

Silver also spoke about a lack of questioning among today's University departments. He noted an instance when a Classics professor was refused tenure because his beliefs were different than the accepted views of the department.

He then named Professor Julius Lestor as an example of the stifling of free inquiry by the Afro-American department. Silver claimed that Lestor was removed from the department after stirring controversy. Strickland claimed Lestor asked to switch departments.

The question period was directed mostly toward Silver, who struck a chord with his criticisms of the Afro-American studies department.

Children's writer Dr. Seuss dies

By BRIGITTE GREENBERG
Associated Press

Theodor Seuss Geisel, the Dr. Seuss whose rhyming children's classics delighted generations of children and parents has died. He was 87.

Geisel, author of "The Cat in the Hat," "Green Eggs and Ham," "How the Grinch Stole Christmas," and dozens of other books, died Tuesday night at his home with his family at his bedside. He had been ill for several months.

He wrote and illustrated 47 books, selling more than 100 million copies in 18 languages. He was awarded a 1984 Pulitzer Prize for his contribution to children's literature.

Geisel's works were journeys into nonsense, magical worlds of truffula trees, ziffs and zuffs and nerkles and nerds, where top-hatted cats run rampant through youngsters' homes while parents are away.

They often included subtle messages on issues important to him, from internationalism to environmentalism.

In his 1984 best seller, "The Butter Battle Book," he offered a parable for the atomic age.

Geisel was childless himself after his first wife's death in 1967, he married Audrey Stone Dimond, a mother of two.

Born March 2, 1904, in Springfield, Mass., son of a brewer who ran a zoo during Prohibition, Geisel graduated in 1925 from Dartmouth, where he drew cartoons for the humor magazine, Jack-O-Lantern.

India plagued by tensions

South Asian expert predicts worsening of internal violence

By CATHERINE FINNERAN
Collegian Correspondent

The social and ethnic unrest ravaging India will get much worse before it gets better, a south asian political science expert told a crowd of about 75 people at Smith College.

Sumit Ganguly, a professor of political science at Hunter College and the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, backed his opinion with a brief history of the factors that led to India's problems. He also suggested possible solutions that may help to alleviate the turmoil that is disrupting his native country.

One of the cases he mentioned was the region of Kashmir. He said that much of the chaos in that area developed after British colonial troops left India and the country divided in two. After that, many Muslims migrated to Pakistan while others went to Kashmir causing civil strife.

Professor Sumit Ganguly talks a Smith College

The Indians wanted a secular state including Kashmir while Pakistan wanted the Muslims who lived in Kashmir under their rule. In the 80s, as a result of their feud many assertive Indians formed small insurgent groups that rebelled using violence.

The uprisal of these rebellions grew into the terrorism we see there now in the 90s, Sumit said. Presently, Kashmir is in a complete state of turmoil, the paramilitary forces, unexperienced in insurgent, rebellion are alienating the Kashmir population pushing the insurgents away from negotiation.

Another insurgency he touched upon is that of the Punjab region. Where the Sikhs, a religious group deviating from Hinduism, were manipulated by the Indian government to destroy another group angering many people from both groups to the point of violence and riot. As a result, all order and rule of law were made ineffective and many civil rights laws broken.

Professor Ganguly also briefly talked about the BJP (the Indian People's Party). This Hindu fundamentalist party which grew rapidly in the 80s, believed in the importance of the linguistic and religious beliefs found mainly in North India. Ganguly said that this group has reached its "plateau" and will begin growing less popular in the future because they appeal only to the Hindus and do not provide for most Indians.

Ganguly outlined some things he felt should be done to end the turmoil in these and other parts of India. He suggested that India's pluralist systems must come to terms with minorities.

He also felt that the minorities also should use some caution and sense in dealing with the Indian state. He stressed the power of the Indian government and its ability to crush rebellions.

Ganguly said that people should be careful about comparing India to the Russian and Baltic States because their conflicts are similar not comparable. India's state of unrest is individual and easy comparisons, as Ganguly called them, only show lack of sensitivity to a very important world issue.

Final results in Senate race

In Stanley Rosenberg's victory over Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin, the three-time Democratic State Representative managed a 3-1 margin over his Republican opponent.

Overall, Rosenberg swept to victory in all 21 communities comprising the Franklin-Hampshire Senate district, taking 15,996 votes to Dagarin's 5,152. The special election drew a light turnout, with 28.6 percent of the registered voters in the district going to the polls.

The two candidates were competing to fill the seat vacated when John Olver was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives on June 4 to fill the seat of the late Silvio Conte.

Rosenberg's margin of victory was particularly large in Amherst, where he garnered 3,255 to Dagarin's 401. Other communities with heavy Rosenberg support included Northampton, where Rosenberg took 6,216 votes to Dagarin's 2,010.

Rosenberg won Hampshire County by a margin of 12,405 to 3,921, while he took 3,591 votes in Franklin County to Dagarin's 1,231.

Student missing

Compiled by DAVID MASSEY

University of Massachusetts Police said yesterday a female McNamara Residence Hall student has been reported missing from her room since 8 a.m. Tuesday. Lt. Mike Grabiec has alerted patrolmen to keep a watch for the student but doubts any "foul play" is involved. "We get this on a regular basis," Grabiec said. He said in most cases the person reported missing was simply out late. At press time, it was unknown if the student had returned.

A juvenile female runaway originally from Rhode Island turned herself in Tuesday morning in the Whitmore Administration Building. The juvenile was returned to her guardian.

Grad students rally for health charge waiver

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

Shouts of "Health care for the masses, not just the upper classes" reverberated through the air outside of the Whitmore Administration Building yesterday as about 100 students voiced their concerns over the Sept. 3 hikes in University Health Services fees.

The fees will result in co-payments — fees to be paid by students for services such as basic physical examinations and prescriptions.

"The struggle continues," said David Mitchell, a UMass employee and member of AFSCME local 509. "Their [the administration's] interests are not our interests. The only way is to take it to the streets."

Mitchell said O'Brien calls himself the "Communication Chancellor," but the talking between the workers and the administration is a struggle in itself.

"We might as well move to Canada where they have national health care," he said.

Graduate Student Senate Treasurer Sarah Lyon said although health care costs are rising, the manner in which the fees were restructured are unfair to the students.

"In 1981, a single student paid a basic health fee of $146 and a supplemental fee of $75," she said. "Now, in 1991, the basic fee is $370 and the supplemental fee is $325 plus the new co-payments. This is outrageous."

Lyon also mentioned a student with a family pays an extra $932.50.

"We're asking for reasonable dialogue, not free health care for all students," she said.

Lyon said students were not informed of any proposal for fee increases and co-payments. She said a committee of administrators and officials from Cooley-Dickenson hospital in Northampton were asked by Chancellor O'Brien to conduct a survey of health cost in the area, resulting in these higher fees.

"What do the people at Cooley-Dick know about me, my health needs and the fee structure here?" she said.

David LaFonte, a member of Local 509, said the health fee increases were an added insult.

"We've had de facto pay cuts because there is no contract and we haven't received a COLA [cost of living adjustment], but the University has no policy for reasonable cost-containment," he said.

Jill Havens, official speaker of the Graduate Employees Organization, said the administration said there is no money for the fee waiver for the health fee for graduate students.

"They [the administration] said there was no money for the curriculum fee waiver [two years ago]," she said. "The administration thinks we don't deserve the waiver. We're employees. We work hard."

"State employees pay 10 percent of their health care," he said. "Aren't graduate students employees? What the hell are you doing paying 100 percent of you health fees?" said Havens.

Havens said that even if the health fee is waived, the graduate students will still have to pay the co-payments, and she said she feels that is unfair.

The protesters then entered Whitmore and went to Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin's office and Chancellor O'Brien's office, chanting "strike" and "We want Dick."

leaves," she said.

CAN's spokesperson Kevin Aplin stressed the importance of legalizing the possession, cultivation, sale, trade and transport of cannabis because of it's many uses, including fiber, fuel and medicine. Aplin said he does not see recreational use as a threat because there have been no reported deaths caused by the drug's use.

"What place does the government have in telling you can or cannot change your consciousness?," he asked.

UMACRC President Kai Alexis Price said that he would like to stage more events in the future to help raise awareness in Amherst on this issue.

said the graffiti took a turn for the worse. "Jeff sucks Dick" appeared on his door. Jeff filed a witness statement with RD Athakorala. The next night he said he came home and found his House Council President sign ripped in two.

At this point Guertzen decided to intervene. She said she put up a sign on her floor that said "Yo floor: there have been several incidents of harassment involving graffiti on the floor and I do not appreciate it. A floor community is built on R.E.S.P.E.C.T." The sign also urged anyone who had a problem with living there to come talk to her.

things like that don't stop with messages on the door... I felt like it was happening to me and no one else."

McKeough said "that I realized, not just for me, but for other gay people too, I hadn't done anything to stop it."

The Residential Staff gave a mandatory program on homophobia on first floor on September nineteenth. Before the meeting McKeough walked through all eight floors of his building, asking friends to sign a poster requesting that the harassment stop.

McKeough said first he just asked friends, but as other residents read the poster, more people wanted to sign it. The poster said, "Hey Homophobe! Enough is enough. If you

A critical look at columns

Ideally, the editorial/opinion page of a university newspaper should be its most interesting space, the space which allows students to voice their concerns on issues of importance. The voice of college students is nearly absent from the mainstream media, so the editorial/opinion page provides a rare forum for students to voice their ideas.

Richard S. Barry

A daily reading of the editorial/opinion page of the Collegian, however, makes one wonder if the average college student is merely a wise-ass, incapable of writing a thoughtful piece on anything besides the deplorable state of the University, or the evil foreign policy motives of the United States.

The typical editorial is written in the first person, the author imagining himself/herself an innocent character wandering through the bureaucratic purgatory known as UMass. The tone of the editorial is usually conversational, the author offering pearls of wisdom on the level of "the classes suck," of "Housing sucks" or "Whitmore sucks." It is never what the author is specifically complaining about or what suggestions she or he is offering. The reader is simply left with a vague notion that something "sucks."

The other type of editorial gracing the editorial/opinion page is the political essay. Usually this essay is about an evil empire entitled the United States or an evil entity known as George Bush. The essay is generously sprinkled with such words as "imperialistic," "oppressive," "racist," and "patriarchal." It is unclear whether the author actually understands politics or believes that spitting out the aforementioned buzz words tied to some current political crisis is knowledge enough.

Apparently, aspiring writers have never heard of a structure known as the essay. In a critical essay, an author identifies a problem, suggest the roots of a problem, and perhaps offers solutions to a problem. The essay is usually written in the third person, to suggest that it is a general problem, and the author usually maintains a moderate tone, believing persuasion the product of logical thought, not hostile catch words.

What is so tedious about the editorial/opinion page is not the political beliefs of the authors or the attempts at writing humor. What is tedious is the sheer lack of original thought and the deplorable writing. There is hardly anyone writing anything of any weight or any originality. The page is littered with cliches, snideness, and truisms.

We are college students at a time of monumental changes, both in the United States and throughout the world, that would have been incomprehensible even a decade ago. And rather than responding to these events with curiosity or intellect, students are responding with sarcasm and inanity. Perhaps this writer is overemphasizing the importance of the opinion page, but it makes one wonder how this generation will respond to crises once we have assumed power. Will there be real solutions offered? Or just sarcasm and ambivalence?

Long tap lines and bad manners typify off—campus parties

The off-campus party scene flourishes beginning every Thursday night of every week here at UMass. At one time or another, everyone has the fortune of experiencing this weekly nightmare which, for some reason, we seem to look forward to.

I attended an off-campus party on Friday night at the apartment of some close friends of mine. Through diligent observation, I came to the conclusion that there was material for an article here. I began to take note of what I witnessed.

First of all, I, being a close friend of two of the hosts, was in the upper echelon of the "Off-Campus Party Hierarchy." Yes, there are even class distinctions at an activity whose purpose is to make people wind up face down in the gutter. The Hierarchy is as follows: 1) house members, 2) friends of house members, 3) friends of friends of house members, 4) women, and 5) the commoners.

If you have ever been a commoner, I understand your plight. You paid your money and all you want is a few cold ones, right? Wrong. Commoners have been known to wait up to 45 minutes for one beer, usually of poor quality. Since I was a friend of the hosts, I worked the keg for a while to earn my cover charge. No cover charge is another advantage of being in the upper echelon of the Party Hierarchy.

As the sacred "tap-master," the very fate of the party-goers' sobriety lay in my hands. I noticed that the masses who had previously glanced at me nonchalantly were now begging for my attention, or my mercy. I had to chuckle at these poor souls whom I had absolute power over.

Every person seemed to have their own special tactic for trying to get me to refill their cup. "Hey dude, you were in my Econ class last semester, weren't you?"

To these inquisitive types, I would say, "No, I'm an English major."

"What the hell are you gonna do with that?" they would reply. "Ha!"

"No beer for them," I would laugh to myself.

Todd Kane

Some people would just smile at me and hope to appeal to my good nature. Sometimes this worked. Other people would simply rush the keg and slam their cup in my face. This never worked.

In addition to running the keg, I also overheard some of the conversations going on around the festivities. You know, for something dubbed a "social event," off-campus parties seem more like shouting matches to me. How can you talk about those issues you think are so "deep" when you're drunk and Led Zeppelin is being cranked out of a $2,000 stereo system? Maybe people aren't listening to each other. Could this be possible? I think so.

People seem to get very emotional at these events. I looked around and saw drunks hugging each other as if they were all terminally ill and would be dying before the next bash. I saw grown men arguing about the best defense in the NFL. Who cares? The purpose of partying is to share a few laughs over beers, not to get all emotional about things you won't remember in the morning.

The last thing about off-campus parties which I have witnessed is people's lack of consideration for the hosts as well as their property. Throwing a big party is quite an undertaking and should be appreciated by those in attendance; it's common courtesy. Yet, after three years of attending these parties, I still see people spitting on floors, throwing skunked beers which are usually full of butts on the floor, and basically treating the place like an ash tray expects to be treated.

At the party I attended Friday night, three posters were stolen from the living room, the floors and walls were pasted with "party muck," and someone stole my friend's hair gel. This is the lowest of the low. Whoever stole the gel should have saved the three bucks from the party which they probably weren't welcome at and bought some of their own.

Off-campus parties are, indeed, good places in which to observe the basic principles of human nature; the basest of these principles being, "When the beer is gone, the party's over." I happen to enjoy these weekly events and always thank the hosts for selflessly subjecting their homes to mindless abuse and mistreatment. I sure wish everyone else would.

Friendship proves stronger than distance or age difference

There is no one quite like a grandmother. Those warm, loving and kind individuals can make even the most unhappy people feel loved.

I am named after my maternal grandmother. My grandfather remarried before I was born and my step-grandmother has never been considered such, for she is just as much my real grandmother.

As for my paternal grandmother we have a different kind of relationship. I don't think of her as a grandmother, despite the fact she knits me sweaters, mails me home-baked cookies and loves to read everything I write, but more as a friend.

When I was five years old I gave her the nickname Nana Beach, Nana B for short, because she lived on the ocean.

My strongest memories of Nana B as a child were the stories she would tell. My favorite were those about my grandfather who passed away before I really had the chance to get to know him.

Listening to her deep, soothing voice, I remember gazing at her nimble hands as they wound themselves over and through multi-colored yarn that, like magic, would turn into slippers for me and everyone else in my family.

Felice Cohen

If my mom was around, Nana B would talk about my dad and how, when he was a boy there were always lots of girls coming to visit him.

Though over the years I've begun to see Nana B in a different light. The distinction between a small girl and a grown woman has disappeared. I see this difference when I look at the relationship now between Nana B and my nine year old sister.

What Nana B and I share now is a friendship that has grown over the past 21 years. Living away from home, I no longer need my parents to tell me to come to the phone to "say hi to Nana." I'll call her on my own during the week just to hear her say, if nothing else, "this call is going to cost a lot."

And every winter since I started college, I have visited her down in Florida. I enjoy hanging out with Nana B and her friends, "the girls," as she calls them. I'm the first to admit it is not the same as a typical Saturday night uptown in Amherst, but for that I'm grateful. I can always do that.

Time spent with these women, all over the age of 65, is not only fun, but educational. They've taught me how to find the best bargains, that vinegar is a great solution for any stain and how to use your body parts to predict the weather.

But the most important thing I've learned from them is that no matter how old you appear on the outside you'll always stay young on the inside.

When I look at these women I don't see tanned skin brushed with laugh lines, hair that has turned gray or legs that move at a slower pace then my own, but people.

People who are still alive.

Last weekend I saw the movie "Strangers in Good Company." It was about eight women, between the ages of 65 and 95, who were stranded at an old house on the water in the middle of the country.

I watched these women search through old chests for bedding, create innovative ways to catch fish and take pills for every ache and pain they had. Sitting in this tiny theatre in Northampton, I imagined that the women on the screen were not the actors they portrayed, but my friends from Florida.

The stories they shared and the lives they spoke of were familiar to me. I recognized their concerns and laughed at their humor. The movie left me feeling as if I had just returned from an early visit with Nana B and the girls.

Arriving home, I called Nana B and when I heard her voice, broke into tears. "What's wrong honey?" she asked.

"Nothing Nana. I just wanted to hear your voice."

Ethnocentrism, classism and race

A great Cuban artist once said that in a world of blind people the one-eyed would rule.

In a society founded on the rhetoric democracy where slaves accounted for three-fifths of a person (one person, one vote) and where the Native Aborigines and women had no right to participate, the predominant solutions are often thought of as a struggle for power. Consequently, we find that the essence of this form of power lies on the division of the oppressed, and the simplification and homogenization of our communities, into a "melting pot."

Charles Venatur

It seems to me that the traditional problem in this university concerning the Anglo-American Black and the Hispanic-American organizations is based on their continuous antagonistic struggle for power. While the "collective" leadership of these organizations have not learned (or perhaps don't wish) to network and support each other with a progressive agenda, the students are being recycled into the oppressive system.

To understand this notion we must first accept our current conditions, the weakness that our institutionalized leadership (as a collective body) is suffering. Perhaps the most critical are the oversimplistic ethnocentrism, the classist and at times racist attitudes that both the Anglo-American Black and Hispanic organizations use to downplay each other, in the timely contentions for power, as a result of their continuous begging for funds.

The end result thus becomes a lacking of progressive and viable solutions to our traditional and common dilemma: oppression.

These and many other attitudes that our common leadership (as a collective body) has both inherited and adopted from the slave masters/imperialists are perhaps the weakest links in our common chain.

It must therefore be understood that at the present time we may be our own worst enemies. The original oppressor is easily identified yet the enemies within are very hard to identify. Moreover, at a time when our resources are scarce, those who currently exert some power over our people can easily promote their oppression.

Therefore, we must strive to network and pool our resources as a way to overcome our current situation. This, however, does not attempt to imply that we should all become Anglo-American Black or Hispanic, but that we can use our individuality to complement the collective reality.

If the students can take such a revolutionary step as to seek an education, our leadership should either get a backbone or bail out. As a wise Anglo-American Black once told me, "It is time that our people begin seeing themselves as puppets tied to the individual fingers of the hand of oppression."

Dorm stereotypes show closed minds

Overheard: "Do you believe that girl in our History class? What a bimbo! She must live in Southwest."

What classifies a "bimbo?" Is it how she does her hair or wears her clothes? Is it the kind of car she drives? Who really knows? These terms are the most often heard when someone is talking about Southwest. Yet, Southwest is not the only residential area suffering from stereotypes. Labels such as scab, nerd, slut, loser, mush, dweeb, and dork are tagged onto other housing areas and dorms. Are these words a large part of your vocabulary? Well, I am interested to know where you come off making assumptions about people that you don't even know. Who cares how that girl walking ahead of you does her hair, or what sexual preference that guy sitting next to you on the bus has? It's not your problem and certainly none of your business. Is it so important as to why someone chose a particular dorm? Personally, I resent being categorized as something just because of where I reside.

When I first changed residence my sophomore year, I didn't question whether the decision was right for me and, whatever my reasons for moving, it was my personal decision. However, if you are still grumbling about "the Southwest bitch" in the seat ahead of you, maybe you ought to think twice about attending this university. UMass is known for diversity, something you obviously don't respect or understand.

If you are insulted by this, take another look, because if you think this column is about you then maybe it's time to grow up.

Dyke and skinhead tip a few and the labels fall away

Sometimes amazing things happen all by themselves. And they indelibly mark everyone afterwards.

That is what happened to me Monday night when I went out drinking with some male buddies to a local bar in Amherst.

I should have known, from the very fact that I let myself be persuaded to go to a male college bar that is small, dark, smoky, and frankly, more than a little scary to the general lesbian consciousness, that this would be a memorable experience.

And it was. I had a great time. My buddies and I went through some form of male—dyke bonding that was truly wonderful. We sat around, drank beers, laughed, talked, and enjoyed each other's company, totally oblivious to the strange fact that we were a very diverse group—different races, sexual orientations, and genders. We toasted each other so many times it wasn't funny.

As the beer took effect the conversations got very interesting (One could even say strange). I think the best occurred between myself and a friend of one of my buddies. His name was Jesse and he and I sat side-by-side, cramped around a tiny square table. The conversations were loud, and proximity urged both of us to start our own discussion.

I think the others stopped and started listening after the first two or three sentences. They went something like this: My name is Jesse. What's yours again?

It's Trystan. Nice to meet ya Jesse.

Wait—did you say your name was Trystan? As in the infamous Trystan?

I think it was at this point that the table got quiet. And well they should have, because the interchange that followed was incredibly memorable.

Trystan Skeigh

Come to find out, Jesse was a skinhead last semester—not the Mahatma Gandhi kind either. In brief, he was a member of, as he described it, a neo-nazi student organization that practiced quite a bit of intolerance for other people, particularly homosexuals. And more particularly, me. He said he and his group used to pore over my columns and express various, easily imaginable comments and conjecture about me, my looks, my attitude about men, and probably (he didn't say this) a hope for my untimely demise.

We were both a little shocked by all this.

The strange thing was, before he told me this, I liked the guy. He was funny, friendly, easy to be with—he didn't do anything that felt sexist, homophobic or insensitive.

And I think he liked me too. The dismay on his face (and mine) must have been obvious as we pondered our dilemma.

Should we get up and walk away from each other? Should I ream him up and down for the atrocious sicko organization he belonged to last semester? Should he go ahead and kill lil' ol' deviant me and win brownie points from his white, male supremacist genocidal group? (Again, that's my conjecture—I can't really read minds).

The solution to our dilemma was spontaneously, simultaneously realized, and even though I'll admit the alcohol was probably a major player in this encounter, I strongly contend that for once, the fruits of Bacchus were medicinal and healing, rather than destructive.

Jesse looked at me, the confusion in his eyes obvious, and asked, "but don't you hate men?" as I looked at him and asked "don't you want to kill me?" And we both said NO—and then we raised our beers, clicked our glasses and toasted "Diversity!"

And afterwards we walked each other home down the middle of the road, staggering arm-in-arm singing disgracefully sacrilegious songs about Jesus at the top of our lungs. We even gave each other a hug before we said good night.

You figure it out. All I know is something feels very important about me and Jesse, a "Dyke" and a "Skinhead", drinking beer together and having a blast. Like maybe a deeper truth slipped in somehow and caught us both by surprise. And I'm glad it did.

GEO deserves support

Do we want to improve our lives? For most of us, it is not a difficult question to answer. The response is an overwhelming "Yes!" Yet, when it comes down to actually doing something about it, well that's another story.

It is understandable that that on today's often chaotic college campus, where politics is a four-letter word and bureaucracy is just around the corner, many of us get fed up. All of the rallies and actions tend to blur together, and we consequently turn away and try to make it all disappear.

Eric Frank

There is a lot going on, but if we just took a few minutes to really think about what is happening, many of us would see that there is one simple fundamental truth that runs through all of this.

It centers around people trying to improve their lives. They have taken the difficult step of transforming their wishes for an improved quality of life, and consequently a better world for all of us, into action.

They do not deserve our scorn or indifference, but rather our respect and support. As we rapidly approach October 1, I would like to bring one particular group into focus, the Graduate Employee Organization.

You're probably asking "Why October 17" That is the date that GEO has set to vote as a union whether or not they will have to go out on strike. Nobody like to strike, and the GEO is certainly no exception. It means that they don't get paid, and for many of us undergraduates, we don't get taught.

This is the amazingly difficult choice of people who are up against the wall, who are tired of being some of the lowest-paid graduate employees in the country. They are tired of working two or three jobs on top of pursuing their graduate degrees, and taking on teaching or research responsibilities.

They are tired of not being officially recognized as employees by the University, while subsequently being recognized as University employees by the all-knowing Internal Revenue Service. They are tired of fighting the same battles over and over again with the administration. They just want to get on with their studies and responsibilities, and we as undergraduates ought to acknowledge their struggle.

The GEO is not made up of some green scaly creatures from out of space. They are the TAs who teach many of our discussion sections, grade our papers, and help us out during office hours.

They have fought side by side with the undergraduate student body against the state budget cuts to higher education. They have taken on more and more of the teaching burden at UMass as the faculty is increasingly cut.

To a large degree, it is our own educations that will suffer if they go out on strike, or if they are forced to continue to work under substandard conditions. Also many of us are likely to be in the same boat a few years down the line if we choose to attend graduate school. It is very likely that a little support for GEO now may directly improve our own graduate school experiences.

So why not say a few words of support to your TA in class this week? Why not stop in the Whitmore courtyard on Friday at noon to watch what should be some very fun guerrilla theatre? Why not drop in their offices at 201 Student Union and see if you can offer a helping hand?

In essence, why not demonstrate some solidarity and throw support behind their struggle? After all, they are just trying to improve their lives, right?

Eric Frank is a UMass student

'Tis nobler in the mind to register

To vote or not to vote, that is the question. "Whether 'tis nobler the mind to suffer the sling and arrows of outrageous fortune, or to take arms against a sea of troubles, and by opposing end them."

Out of context I find these lines of Shakespeare's quite analogous to the question of whether to vote or not. Hamlet was questioning, in his famous little speech, whether or not one should act or not act and just lay down and die. With regards to voting, I think every individual should also ask themselves this very question. 'Tis nobler the mind to simply let our politicians rule and to suffer their sling and arrows (fortunate or not), or to exercise our right in this era of troubles, and by voting end those troubles? Me thinks 'tis nobler to vote.

We are living in an era of troubles. Should public-funded education be privatized? Should a middle income taxpayer pay roughly an additional $20,000 in taxes over the next ten years, so as to compensate those who lost their investment during the S&L crisis? Should we as a nation have the right to dictate democracy to other nations through military force? Issues such as these are in our sea of troubles and will get resolved in one way or another.

Shall we, the people, have a voice in these issues, or shall we let under-represented politicians make decisions concerning these issues for us? There is a campaign to get a ballot question on the 1992 presidential ballot concerning the issue of who will pay for the S&L bailout, and we constituents will then be able to vote directly on this matter.

So why am I wasting my time on whether 'tis nobler to vote? Because, next week on Wednesday, October 2, there will be a voter registration drive. All students will have an opportunity to register to vote in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union, between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. So act! — or lay down and sleep perchance to dream.

What better way to die than sex?

This letter is in response to the story that appeared in the Collegian on Monday, September 23. It dealt with a teenage boy, Shannon Richardson, who passed away while having sex with Jeanne Piccirillo, a married woman. I gave the matter a cursory once-over, and decided to write this article.

I've been giving the situation mentioned above some deep thought, and I've decided that this kid has latched onto something. What better way to kick the bucket? He didn't get mauled in car accident, shot by a drug dealer, or burned to death. In fact, he died while getting some - which is more than you can say for Gandhi, Martin Luther King, Harvey Milk, or John Lennon. John Kennedy, at least, messed around with Marilyn and Abgie before he bought the farm. But all that is beside the point.

You see, I don't really expect anything great to happen to me in the near future — and school is no big deal. And I haven't been getting much action lately. Plus, the only other way I'd like to end it all would be doped up and watching TV, but I'd have to wait until I was 80 and my kids put me in a nursing home for that. Besides, if I died I'd save my parents 14 grand.

So, if there are any married, sexually liberated women who are tired of their husbands out there, look me up. For a one way ticket on a last chance ride.

When Crowded House and Richard Thompson bring their double-bill to the Fine Arts Center this Sunday, fans of pop and folk-rock will be fools to miss out. The wit and wisdom Richard Thompson brings to his playing and singing will transfix the listener while the melodic pop hooks of Crowded House will have people wiggling in their seats.

Both Thompson and Crowded House are on the road in support of new albums. Thompson's Rumor and Sigh is an eclectic mix of Anglo-Celtic guitar twang and Van Morrison-esque soul. The album title is taken from a poem by Archibald Macleish. Speaking of the poem line, "Rumor and sigh of unimagined seas," Thompson explains, "The poem is about creativity, the reasons you write."

The album's 14 songs tell about all sorts of eccentrics including drunks, lovers, lunatics, and an accordion-loving record collector. A common theme of displacement, be it social, political, or psychic, runs through all the songs. Thompson elaborates, "I suppose there's music that I want to hear that I don't hear other people doing, that would express what I would wish to say, and because it doesn't exist, I have to do it. Or else become a seething psychopath," much like the storyteller in his album closer "Psycho Street". Album highlights are the moody measured ballad, "I Misunderstood" and the acoustic, English broadside styled "1952 Vincent Black Lightning."

Equally eclectic but a little more silly, Crowded House just got more crowded. For their latest release, Woodface, Neil Finn's brother Tim joined them on keyboards and vocals. As a solid unit of four the band has found a delightful mix of pop romanticism and art-rock whimsy. Following in the footsteps of previous works, their muses inspire them in odd ways. Tim Finn explains the first single, Chocolate Cake: "I was in a New York restaurant and was sitting next to this woman who had just finished an enormous meal. Then she sat back and said 'Should I ask for the check or another piece of chocolate cake!' I told Neil about it and ten minutes later that anecdote led to the song." Their odd inspirations are often responsible for hugely entertaining live shows where the band writes songs on stage, swaps instruments, and hold informal talent quests. One critic calls them "pop's reigning court jesters."

The careers of some of these musicians span the last twenty years or pop history. London-born Richard Thompson, for example, was a founding member of Fairport Convention. Beginning when he was seventeen, Thompson played with them for six years. Their work with producer Joe Boyd (REM, Billy Bragg) is credited with starting the British version of folk-rock. Thompson went on to record several albums with his wife Linda Thompson. Commercially obscure, both I want to see the Bright Lights and Shoot out the Lights were listed in Rolling Stone's 100 best albums of all time. His recent solo work has received much critical praise and his newest effort may very well transfer that into commercial success.

Tim and Neil Finn of Crowded House have also had lengthy careers. The Finn brothers were core members of the New Zealand/Australian band Split Enz. Formed in 1972, their carnival stage costumes combined with quirky, poignant pop songs and an odd stage presence to bring them pop-chart success Down Under.

Their 1982 album True Colours, earned them an American top-fifty single and a spot on Saturday Night Live. They broke up the next year.

Neil Finn went on to form Crowded House with Paul Hester on drums and Nick Seymour on bass. Their eponymous 1986 album spawned the instant classic "Don't Dream It's Over" and the sleeper hit "Something So Strong". The follow up, Temple of the Low Men, a much more dense and moody work, produced one single, "Better Be Home Soon".

Both performers are known for their inspiring performances and Sunday night promises to be an odd, moving, silly good time.

Besides, the library closes early on Sundays.

Crowded House and Richard Thompson will perform Sunday in the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are $18.50, $16, and $14 and are available at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 586-8686. The show starts at 8:30 p.m. .

Allan Holdsworth rips at the Horse

By DAKKAN ABBE
Collegian Staff

I went to the Iron Horse Monday night with little knowledge of the music of Allan Holdsworth and I was given a first class education. Accompanied by ace keyboards, bass, and drums, the veteran fusion guitarist wasted no time in shredding his fretboard with flawless jazz scales. Drummer Chad Wackerman guided the band through the complex time changes that never paused to get in a groove. When Holdsworth stopped ripping, he handed the solo responsibilities over to a brilliant keyboardist who matched Allan in both speed and inventiveness.

To many of the people at the show, Allan's appearance at the Horse was akin to a private showing of the second coming of Christ. Allan has long been considered by guitar freaks to be one of the greatest guitarists of all time, and certainly one of the most ignored. His fusion albums have proved him to be a guitarist in the ranks of John McLaughlin and Jeff Beck, but he has yet to become well known outside of the ranks of die-hard fusion-heads. Despite Holdsworth's brilliance, this is unlikely to change in the near future, owing to a general lack of imagination in the listening public.

Holdsworth has become well known (among those in the know) as a promoter of the Synth-Axe, but Monday night he stuck to somewhat more standard guitars. For his encore, he brought out a beast of a guitar that had a neck about a third longer than a standard one. Watching his fingers fly across the frets one gets the feeling that he could have quadrupled the length of the neck and played that with equal ease. Even more amazing at times than his rapid fire solos were the chords he created during the keyboard solos. His fingers stretched to the breaking point on each chord, Holdsworth seemed to be transforming guitar playing into a contortionist circus act. Speed and contortions aside, Holdsworth simply played the right notes. Like Charlie Parker dancing around a saxaphone, his speed was simply the medium in which he expressed himself fully. Allan Holdsworth is no techno-wizard scale-demon, but rather a beautiful guitarist who happens to be fast.

New, rough and eclectic album by Chilis

By ROLAND COGGIN
Collegian Correspondent

Blood Sugar Sex Magik
Red Hot Chili Peppers

The Red Hot Chili Pepper's first release since 1989's Mother's Milk, Blood Sugar Sex Magik is seventy minutes of surprises. The band continues to mature and explore new musical ground with an album that will please old fans and attract new ones.

Mother's Milk was successful musically and commercially, but the band admitted they weren't tight; the young guitarist John Frusciante and drummer Chad Smith were Chili Peppers for only a few weeks before the recording. But after touring and growing together, the four band members felt close enough to play to their potential.

The Chili Peppers moved their gear into a secluded Spanish ranch in Los Angeles to record their new album away from distractions. The house, which they say is haunted, inspired them like a recording studio wouldn't, and living together had obvious advantages. They began writing music in a wider range of styles than ever before, showing their maturity and non-commercial attitude.

Singer Anthony Keides says Blood Sugar Sex Magik was a breeze to record. Many tracks were recorded on the first take for the sake of spontaneity, and unlike a lot of today's bands, they kept the production to a minimum.

Their unorthodox techniques paid off. The album sounds raw and inspired, and it's the Chili Pepper's most eclectic to date. Included are two acoustic ballads (no joke), a Chili Pepper twist of the blues with Robert Johnson's "They're Red Hot", and more slow funk than you'll believe. The band is even tighter than they promised to be, and lacks no energy from the opener, "The Power of Equality", the title track.

Anthony Keides' singing is surprisingly varied throughout the album; he sings more melodically than ever at times, and borders on rap at others. Bassist Flea lays down monster grooves with less flash than on past albums, maintaining his distinction effectively. The most notably improved member is guitarist John Frusciante, who continues to grow musically. His Hendrix-inspired leads and white-hot rhythm playing will drop jaws as he helps the Chili Peppers reach higher ground.

Blood Sugar Sex Magik is a refreshing change for the Red Hot Chili Peppers, and should be a welcome addition to record store's increasingly mediocre "new release" sections. The album isn't likely to get much radio play, but it's definitely worth buying. The Chili Peppers are as impressive as ever; if you haven't heard them yet, buy an album today and experience funk heaven.

Local music scene flourishes this weekend in the Valley

By BRIAN HARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

Welcome to "Jabberwocky", a weekly column devoted to the local music scene and scheduled to appear every Thursday in "This Weekend". If you haven't just fallen off the turnip truck in Hadley then you must already know that the Amherst/Northampton area is a teeming breeding ground for emerging bands and musicians possessing a wide range and depth of styles and development. Many of these unsigned local bands have put out cassette and CD releases that are better than a plethora of the corporately packaged crap being peddled and marketed in the music magazines and the mega-retail record outlets. Sometimes they actually get signed to the major indies and the corporate labels. Dinosaur Jr., Buffalo Tom and Pixies all began right here at UMass and started their gigging at the Northampton clubs. The Sighs, a local club act for many years, were signed this past summer to a major label and are currently out in L.A. recording their debut album. Who will be next? Word on the street is that a couple of well known local bands are being courted by industry big shots. My advice is to take advantage of the many diverse bands this area has to offer. Make a point of checking out the local music scene and frequenting the local clubs. Hire a band for your house party. If you can't drink, or don't drink, then try attending the 18 plus shows that many of the area clubs and colleges offer. Support live music and local musicians.

Over at Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton on Saturday night will be one of those local artists who should have been signed to a record contract a long time ago. Ray Mason and his group have been making the rounds for many years and they put on one of the most fun live shows in the Valley. Ray reminds me a lot of Neil Young. His songs are catchy and brash with the type of hooks and lyrics that you find yourself humming while in supermarket checkout lines. On the same bill at Sheehan's that night will be the Barbara Keith Band. Now here's a woman who had some brief national acclaim, took a hiatus from the music business, and has returned to her music roots again with an ambitious local start and a hot new album. Her cassette has been the on the top of the local music charts all summer and it's available at most of the local record stores. Hopefully it will be picked up by an indie label. For those of you who have the cassette, now is the opportunity to see Barbara Keith live. As a friend of mine over at WRNX puts it, "This woman rocks out like NRBQ." I should note that the Barbara Keith Band is a family affair, featuring father and son on drums and bass respectively.

Over at Pearl Street this Saturday night will be UMass favorites One Eyed Jake opening for John Cafferty and the Beaver Brown Band. From what I hear this is the first area club appearance of One Eyed Jake this semester. These guys have established themselves as the best and most popular band for fraternity and house parties. Fans take notice: One Eyed Jake will be releasing a CD titled "City Ride" very soon. I'll keep you posted.

LOCAL SCENE

Sunday looks interesting. The TibetFest Benefit Concert at Pearl Street will feature a host of the best area jazz musicians. Headlining the concert will be internationally renowned saxaphonist Marion Brown in one of his rare local appearances. When not performing in Europe, Marion Brown makes Northampton his country home away from New York City. Also on the bill are Tony Vacca and Tim Moran as well as Valley jazz piano impressario Tom McClung. Completing the lineup will be Amandla as well as Justina and Joyce.

Headbangers and metal maidens growing tired of their new Guns N' Roses albums might want to go over to Katina's on Route 9 in Hadley on Sunday night for what has become the most happening metal scene in Western Mass. The shows are all ages. This week features popular local headliners Plastic X and two other bands in what is being billed as a "ferocious triple play".

The great thing about the Iron Horse in Northampton, aside from the room acoustics and dynamite sound system, is that the shows are always all ages, meaning all college students are welcome. Next Tuesday, October 1st, is a local show featuring Free Press and a new band called Flower-Thief. Free Press are a highly charged, dance-orientated ska band fronted by local figure Rob Skelton who is prone to wearing dresses on stage. They broke up over the summer, but the good news is that they are back together again.

Flower-Thief has got to be the best new local band I've heard in a long time. They're a "girl group" (no disrespect intended). Jennie goes to Hampshire and Christine goes to Smith but they've been best friends since they were 12 and they've been writing their quirky songs together since high school. Their sound is refreshingly original, somewhere between folk and punk, and they feature some dynamite vocal harmonies. Flower-Thief has also recently added a violinist, which should make for a very interesting night of music.

The Crossing will bring Celtic music to Campus Center

By ALAN WILLCOX
Collegian Correspondent

WMUA continues its innovative Live Music Project this weekend, with a studio performance by The Crossing, at 2 p.m. on Saturday, in Campus Center room 101. The public is welcome, and the event is offered free of charge. The performance will be broadcast on 91.1 FM, on Saturday at midnight.

The Crossing's music ranges from Irish and Scottish, to contemporary folk to Middle Ages and Renaissance music, and they even have been known to perform renditions of popular songs a la P.D.Q. Bach. Whether it's a haunting rendition of the traditional "Be Thou My Vision", or an enthusiastic foot-stomping jig, their message never gets in the way of the music. It's not unusual for their tunes to kick into a dance tempo, suitable for throwing off your shoes and dancing about the room (usually welcome behavior at a Crossing concert), in fine Celtic tradition.

The Crossing, from Chicago, features several excellent musicians playing the Celtic harp, bouzouki, tin whistles, bodhran, Highland pipes (a.k.a. the bagpipes), fiddle, guitars, and other modern and traditional instruments. The members of the band live in community in urban Chicago. Although the band's music reflects a deep spirituality, they never get preachy. Their music offers a refreshing and human voice in this world of overly commercial and political "artists".

Tony Krogh, the lead singer and songwriter, does offer many challenging lyrics, touching upon the conflict in Northern Ireland (something very close to the band's heart), social responsibility, racial harmony and other themes. He often writes music that reflects his own experiences in America, from the sixties to the nineties. The band also performs traditional and other songs.

To date, the Crossing has two albums out, Look Both Ways and Rise and Go. Their third as yet untitled album is due out on Grrr Records this fall.

The group has played around the country, especially in the Midwest and Northeast, and their gigs have included the Adirondack Folk/Gospel Festival, the Folkway club in Peterborough, New Hampshire, and Cornerstone Festival in Illinois. They have opened for Boiled in Lead.

This is the band's third New England appearance. They have given summer concerts on the Amherst Common for the past two years, and are giving three concerts this year. If you can't make the WMUA studio performance, the band is appearing elsewhere in addition to their performance at WMUA. They will be at the Hampshire College Red Barn on Friday night the 27th at 8 p.m., and at the South Amherst Munson Memorial Library (on the South Amherst Common) on Monday, September 30th at 7:30 p.m. Both these concerts are free, although donations will be suggested and appreciated. The band will also be making an appearance at Agape Community Church (17 Kellogg St., in Amherst - behind Bart's), on Sunday at 3 p.m. or so.

The Crossing concerts this weekend are sure to be an enjoyable, and certainly affordable, experience you won't want to miss.

Local author Patricia MacLachlan talks

By OLIVIA STEWART-LIBERTY
Collegian Correspondent

Patricia Maclachlan, nationally acclaimed, award-winning author of several children's books, was in the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop on Friday, signing copies of her most recent books, "Journey", a novel, and "Three Names", a picture book. Such meetings with her readers are evidently of some importance to Maclachlan, she explained between signings; "When you write, you don't just write for your words to fall off the end of your typewriter, you hope that somebody's out there like that... to read them."

Maclachan is glad to be able to say that finally childrens' literature has come into its own. Some of its importance is realized as opposed to the past when at times it has been virtually dismissed as simplified adults' literature. She emphasizes the differences between the adult reader and the child: "Children read with a kind of earnest belief. They're not jaded like many adults." Maclachlan certainly views writing for children as a type of sacred trust, "a kind of responsibility which appeals to me. A kind of honesty that you need to engage in."

It was a relief to finally come across a successful author who has not used a typewriter from the moment she could sit. Maclachlan instead talks about her personal frustrations with writing. "I don't find it at all easy. It's very annoying sometimes, but..." she acknowledges with a laugh. "It's the only thing I seem able to do." While not romanticising her craft, Maclachlan is on the other hand extremely encouraging to aspiring writers, saying, "When you are a reader, I think writing is always an option and I recommend to children who want to write to read great books."

The most striking thing about Maclachlan's books, both her novels (for all ages) and her picture books, is their overriding sense of place. The poignant descriptions of a landscape and life so completely removed from the Pioneer valley indicate immediately that Maclachlan's heart lies elsewhere. Born and raised in Wyoming, Maclachlan says, "I think what you know first as a child stays with you forever... I feel like a visitor here in the East although I have lived here most of my life."

This aspect of her writing would perhaps suggest an autobiographical element to her books; a concept that she describes as "parallel rather than autobiographical," most of which is subconscious. "I don't always know until I'm through," she says. Often, Maclachlan says that her parents have pointed out latent references to her own childhood (of which she is completely unaware) after publication.

"Sarah Plain and Tall" for which Maclachlan won the 1986 Newbery Medal is clearly a general favorite among her readers as they lined up to buy a copy of her new book "Journey." The books are in many ways similar, narrated through the eyes of a young child as each come to terms with a loss of irrevocable proportion, making their way towards some kind of understanding. I think those who enjoyed "Sarah Plain and Tall" will not be disappointed by "Journey."

lesbian and/or bisexual people, get over it. We and our heterosexual allies outnumber you by far. The people, the law, and the university are on my side. Think about that very hard."

McKeough said after the program ended on his floor he posted the giant sign outside his door. He said his suitemates all signed it and agreed to help keep the suite secure from outsiders.

Since that night, McKeough and Guertzen say the harassment has stopped.

Guertzen stressed the importance of quick, firm intervention. "If you let someone be harassed, people get the message that it's okay, but we gave the message that we were definitely not going to tolerate it, as a staff and a community."

Among the many supportive messages residents left on McKeough's poster is one that particularly stands out. Someone wrote "Gay people love straight people," and someone else replied "Straights love gays right back!"

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AT AMHERST
Health Services

Dear UMass Student Plan/Student Family Member:

Beginning September 3, 1991, the University Health Services instituted a number of additional fees and/or co-payments in order to keep the mandatory Student Health Fee and Student Family Plan fees to a minimum. As a result the following charges will be made.

1. Pharmacy Benefit: Birth control pills, $10.00 per cycle. Each prescription of all other formulary items (including insulin) will be at wholesale cost for up to one month supply, minimum $5.00, maximum $50.00 per prescription. Non-formulary prescriptions at cost plus handling charge.

*2. Surgical Specialist Visits at UHS: $10.00 per visit co-payment, including orthopedics, general surgery, and gynecology specialists. Exclusions: consults regarding termination of pregnancy, and pre- and post- natal visits to specialists remain fully covered.

*3. VISITS BETWEEN 9:00 P.M. AND 8:00 A.M. THE NEXT MORNING: $10.00 per visit co-payment.

*4. VISITS AFTER NOON ON SATURDAY AND ALL DAY SUNDAY, UNTIL 8:00 A.M. ON MONDAY MORNING: $10.00 per visit co-payment.

*5. Allergy Clinic Visit: $10.00 co-payment per visit. Allergy Testing: Full fee-for-service charges for visit and test materials. (Cost of test materials is not covered by SHBP).

*6. Electrocardiograms (routine, non-diagnostic): $10.00 co-payment per test.

*7. Colposcopy Exam: $25.00 co-payment per exam.

*8. Sigmoidoscopy Exam: $25.00 co-payment per exam.

9. Diabetic Supplies: Covered at 50% of costs.

10. Physical Examinations (routine, non-diagnostic): $25.00 per exam, plus any necessary laboratory tests.

For services which occur after the UHS Cashier's Office is closed (especially afterhours and weekend visits), co-payments can be made at the Cashier's Office for up to two weeks after the visit. AFTER TWO WEEKS OF NO PAYMENT, AN ADDITIONAL $5.00 HANDLING FEE WILL BE ADDED TO THE CO-PAYMENT AND A BILL WILL BE SENT. Any bills not cleared within a reasonable time can lead to administrative withdrawal from the University. (These added charges do not apply to Kaiser Permanente members at UHS.)

We regret to announce these modest changes for the coming year. However, we will continue to work with you and the Student Health Advisory Board to minimize additional charges without jeopardizing necessary services.

• GOOD NEWS for the Supplemental Health Benefits Plan and Student Family Health Plan subscribers...THE ASTERISKED CO-PAYMENTS ARE COVERED under your SHBP or FHP. If you have not subscribed yet, there is still time....visit the UHS Cashier for information or call 549-2671, ext. 232.

Bob, it says here you've been a bagger for 23 Years! Is that true?
That's right, sir!
Wow. You know, I'll bet it's a coincidence, the same thing all this time. Starting tomorrow, you're Vice President.
...Vice President?
Sure. But for the rest of today, feel free to put everyone's bread underneath their heavier items.
BLESS YOU, SIR!
-No problem! See you 'round the executive washroom!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Obtaining your heart's desire may be difficult now. Avoid using unorthodox business methods; they could backfire. Disclose a secret wish to your mate and let nature take its course.
TAURUS(April 20-May 20): Taking a refresher course in your favorite subject may be a good idea. Cultivate the good will of any interesting people you meet. They could act as stepping stones to your long-range goals.
GEMINI(May 21-June 20): The financial outlook brightens. Continue to keep a close eye on spending. You cannot afford to harbor any illusions about someone's motives. Get agreements in writing.
CANCER(June 21-July 22): Listen closely to someone who has your best interests at heart. Trying new methods and procedures will demonstrate your open-mindedness. A family situation shows improvement.
LEO(July 23-Aug. 22): Take advantage of a special opportunity to promote your interests. Close friends may be reaching out for help. Investigate! Family harmony can be restored if you are more flexible.
VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Your good feelings about yourself help you make a fresh start. Mate or business partner is on your side. Be prepared to explain your financial situation. Give credit where it is due.
LIBRA(Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your communication skills are a tremendous asset. Exchange views freely with your mate or partner. New concepts and challenges enjoy favorable influences. Be sensitive to your loved ones' needs.
SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Leave any personal problems at home when you go to work. Be a doer instead of a watcher! Meet deadlines on time to protect your reputation. Romance merits top priority late in the day.
SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Show more tenderness to your loved ones. Be firm but fair with a youngster who displays an independent streak. If single, reach out to a newcomer who shares your interests.
CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Phone calls and casual chatter should be kept to a minimum while you line up important projects. Allow for last-minute schedule changes. Clearing up a financial riddle will bring new peace of mind.
AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A good time to complete unfinished tasks. Keep your business and personal plans secret to avoid arousing either jealousy or opposition. Planetary conflicts increase psychic tension.
PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): Go all out to salvage a business operation and protect your assets. Jointly owned property may be a special target. Concentrate on long-range possibilities. Now is the time to muster all of your resources.

Water polo beginning to make waves on UMass campus

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

Here at the University of Massachusetts, the water polo team generates nowhere near the amount of interest the football and basketball teams do. After all, the echo-filled, humid air of natatorium (pool area) may not be as appealing to many people as a crisp, sunny Saturday afternoon at Alumni Stadium, or any night at "The Cage." It's even harder for the water polo team to gain respect when they don't even have a home pool.

Until this weekend. Sort of.

This weekend Amherst College will host the New England vs. Mid-Atlantic Challenge. UMass isn't the host school, but when you can't have a party in your own back yard, crash the neighbor's bash!

This is the closest pool the team will play a regular season game in since its inception in 1972. Many sport fans would describe water polo as a "minor" sport, but UMass coach Russ Yarworth prefers the more affectionate "out of the mainstream" moniker.

This water polo program can almost be referred to as Yarworth's 'little baby' as he has been with the team in one form or another since he entered as a freshman in 1974. At that time the team was a club program started by an exercise science major named Bill McCaffery. The team spent their own money, travelling to places that had established programs like Brown and Harvard. There weren't many wins back then, but there are now.

In Yarworth's junior and senior years the team finished in the New England Top 5 rankings, and he was named to the All-N.E. team both years. In 1978, the year he graduated with a biochemistry degree, the program "bogged down." Then, before the '79-'80 season, Yarworth returned to coach swimming and, as he says proudly, "to restore water polo. Sometimes I was more of a friend than a coach." Not surprising since he was all of 21 years old.

"It was always my feeling that the water polo and swimming programs could help each other by expanding recruiting potential," he said. So he recruited both, and some willing swimmers who had not played polo were taught the nuances of the game.

In the early 80's it was hard for the team, as a club, to keep pace with schools developing varsity programs because they no longer invited the clubs to play. Yarworth fell behind the others in recruiting because he lost key contacts.

"I thought of elevating water polo to varsity status," he said. "I asked Frank McInerney (the UMass athletic director) and I was probably the squeakiest of the wheels."

In the fall of '87 Yarworth's wish came true, as through alumni-player contributions and fundraising the team was finally awarded varsity status.

"I was ecstatic when we went varsity," he said. "I've tried to attract athletes to play both sports and draw good attention to the University. It was something he [McInerny] didn't have to do. It helped the overall swimming and water polo programs and our records have justified that.

"I've always thought that Mr. McInerny is a generous man. It's great to see broad-based participation in so many sports, and his philosophy is being severely tested by the state fiscal woes and budget cuts."

The water polo program, playing a sport traditionally dominated by west coast teams, receives more and more attention each year. Last year the team went 16-9 and was ranked as high as 13th nationally. Yarworth's men's swimming teams have won 5 consecutive New England Championships, and in '85 he was named New England Swim Coach of the Year.

UMass water polo doesn't have a long, storied history behind it—yet. Judging by the team's rise to national recognition this "out of the mainstream" sport may make it self well-known on campus, and soon.

NBA stars make U.S. Dream Team unbeatable

By DAVID SCOTT
Collegian Staff

"Jordan bringing the ball up, he's got Magic and Pippen on the wings, over to Magic, back to Jordan, the dish to Ewing, out to Bird for three—Swishhh. USA 253, New Zealand 41 with 2:41 to go in the first half."

Pity the play-by-play person that will be calling the USA Olympic Team's games during the 1992 Summer Olympics. The team, assembled through a selection committee and announced in a drawn out hour long made for TV event last Saturday, is a compilation of the best the NBA has to offer—and in this humble American's opinion—the best the world has to offer.

David Scott

This team is Porsche, it's Godiva chocolate, Samuel Adams Beer and Beverly Hills.

Since the decision was made to include professional athletes for the upcoming games in Barcelona, there have been barroom discussions pitting Isiah Thomas's worth versus John Stockton's, but the ten players chosen thus far are nothing if they're not the "creme de la creme" that the NBA has to offer.

Coach Chuck Daly of the Detroit Pistons (boo, hiss) and his assistants: Duke's Mike Krzyzewski (the premier college coach in the game today), Seton Hall's P.J. Carlesimo (no slouch in the college ranks) and the Cleveland Cavalier's Lenny Wilkens (good with youth), are sure to enjoy their time in Spain.

Let's listen in on a future meeting while the coaches mull over some very difficult decisions.

"What do you think P.J., Pat Ewing or David Robinson at starting center?" Daly will ask, with a grin as wide as the rim.

"Oh, I don't know Chuck, why not throw both of them out there?" P.J. will suggest trying to hold in his laughter. "Twin Towers II, we'll call it."

"No," Coach K will interrupt playing the devil's advocate. "Why don't we start Patrick with Karl Malone and Charles Barkley at the forwards."

"Sounds good," Wilkens will say, sipping his brandy. "But put Bird in there instead of Barkley, let him sink the three."

Tough job, right? Add to the above mentioned names the NBA assist leader four straight years, John Stockton, and Golden State forward Chris Mullin. Two more players will be added later (look for Isiah Thomas, after much hubbub about his omission and Shaquille "The Real Deal" O'Neal from Louisiana State).

Margaritas will be in order after the first ten minutes of each game, as soon as the coaches put things on auto-pilot.

This "Dream Team" will provide nightmares for opposing teams.

The dreaded Russians? Forget it, a certain failed coup and the resulting break-up ensures a team, or teams in disarray.

Yugoslavia? Nope, turmoil there too, although the prospect of Drazen Petrovic, future Celtic Dino Radja, Toni Kukoc and Vlade Divac is impressive. The team will also divide.

Forget the foreign countries, forget the prospect of dazzling, no-look passes, forget the monster dunks and put aside the images of Jordan's tongue hanging out for 40 minutes a game, forget these images and think of one man: LARRY BIRD.

Of Bird, Magic Johnson said, "I fear no one in the NBA, but Larry Bird. He was born to play."

Play, is just what Bird will do, maybe not at the level he played in leading the Celts to the 1986 crown, and maybe not at the level of the prime-Bird, but surely his outside touch, rebounding and leadership will be an integral part of this USA team.

Providing Bird recovers from off-season back surgery, as all indications suggest, the "Hick from French Lick" will get the chance to show all the world what Celtics fans have witnessed for over a decade.

Bird is what James Naismith probably envisioned when he invented the game a century ago down the road in Springfield. Not much flash, little dazzle, just flat-out, relentless hustle and sportsmanship.

Chuck Daly spoke of fears he has that future injuries will change the face of his team and the international rules might be hard to adjust to, but one gets the feeling Daly is just giving lip service to lull other countries into a false sense of security. Forget it Chuck, USA's five-year drought in international competition will be erased and this team will go down as the best ever.

UMass women's tennis set to get back to winning ways

By LILLIAN K. LEGGIO
Collegian Correspondent

Today at 3 p.m. on the Upper Boyden tennis courts, the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team tries prove it can play championship tennis as they battle Central Connecticut State University.

Central Connecticut (4-1) is the defending Division I East Coast Conference Champion. The team is used to winning and last October's 6-3 defeat of UMass was 1 of 12 victories on the 1990 season. Last year, Central Conn was almost unbeatable losing only twice enroute to their championship.

While the Blue Devil's record is certainly admirable, UMass accomplished one thing no other team who lost to them could. UMass won more than two matches. The Blue Devil's coach, Victor Stone, admits that this year's match should be closer than 6-3.

"Last year, Massachusetts played a close, strong match," Stone said. "Since we lost our No. 1 [player], this year the matches should be even closer."

The Minutewomen also seek to bounce back from Tuesday's 6-3 loss courtesy of the University of Hartford that saw UMass drop five out of six singles matches.

"The singles play killed us," said UMass coach Edwin Gentzler. "There were three matches that were close enough for us to win, but didn't."

Hartford's Linda Barton defeated UMass No. 1 player, Shizuko Yamasaki, 6-2, 6-1. UMass' Kerensa Eddy lost to Tracy Sheer in straight sets 6-4, 6-2.

In closer singles matches, UMass No. 2 player Gail Girasella won the first set against Jessica Sklar 6-4, but lost the last two 6-3, 6-1. In a close battle, Jennifer Palumbo defeated Kerri Kaminski 6-4, 5-7, 6-4. UMass' Kelly Grim took Sarah McShane to a second set tie breaker, but still lost 6-4, 7-6 (7-4).

The only singles win for the Minutewomen saw Amy Ryan win the first two sets and the match from Donna Geneen 6-4, 6-3.

"Amy played a smart and consistent game against a very well coached player," Gentzler said.

Doubles were played using the eight game pro-set which simply means that the first doubles team to win eight games in a set, wins the match. Apparently, this system worked to UMass' advantage because they prevailed in doubles play 2-1. Hartford's Sklar and McShane lost to Yamasaki and Ryan 8-4. In UMass' other doubles win Stacy Scheckner and Pam Levine defeated Palumbo and Geneen 8-5. Barton and Sheer got Hartford's doubles win by beating Girasella and Eddy.

"As long as we play competitive and learn from our errors," said Gentzler. "We can only get better."

UN agrees upon Iraqi release proposal

By VICTORIA GRAHAM
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council today accepted an Iraqi proposal as the basis for ending the three-day detention of U.N. weapons inspectors in Baghdad, the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations said.

The inspectors have been held in their bus and in six cars since they uncovered documents describing Iraq's secret nuclear weapons program.

"The team should be able to leave immediately with the documents and they are prepared to do an inventory," U.S. Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering said.

Diplomats said the documents, photographs and videotapes will stay in the possession of the inspectors while they and Iraqi authorities prepare a catalogue of them.

The president of the Security Council is preparing to send a letter back to Iraq accepting Iraq's demand for cataloguing with that condition. "That will go to the Iraqi's almost immediately," Pickering said.

He said the commission was prepared to "do an inventory immediately in the presence of the Iraqis."

The Iraqi offer to end the siege of the inspectors had come in a letter on Wednesday from Iraqi Ambassador Abdul Amir al-Anbari to U.N. Security Council President Jean-Bernard Merimee, the French ambassador.

In New York, Secretary of State James A. Baker III was asked earlier today if Iraq, in its letter, was "playing a game" with the United Nations.

"You'd have to ask them. It's not uncharacteristic of the way they behaved before Jan. 15," said Baker, referring to the mixed signals from Baghdad before the U.S.-led coalition went to war to force the expulsion of Iraqi troops from Kuwait.

The Associated Press reached the U.N. inspectors by satellite telephone several times today. Before the Security Council decision, the team chief, David Kay, said the inspectors had the ability to catalogue the documents if U.N. officials decided they should do so.

The inspectors have been held in a parking lot outside the Iraqi Atomic Energy Commission building since Tuesday, when Iraqi authorities demanded they surrender documents detailing the country's secret nuclear weapons program.

Kay said the documents were secured in one of the cars "in the center of our little circle."

The Persian Gulf War allies have stepped up pressure on Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to comply with U.N. truce measures calling up for the destruction of Scud missiles as well as any nuclear, biological or chemical weapons or production facilities.

Additional U.S. forces are being sent to neighboring Saudi Arabia amid the escalating tensions.

The United States on Wednesday began moving Patriot anti-missile units to the Persian Gulf in case the Security Council orders military escorts for U.N. teams searching Iraq.

On Tuesday, Iraq gave the Security Council written assurance that it would no longer interfere with U.N. helicopter surveillance flights another demand of the United Nations that Iraq had initially ignored. U.N. officials said Iraq might be tested in four or five days with a search for Scud missiles in western Iraq.

Just squashing bugs not enough for UMass professor

By JOSH REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

The invaders have proven tenacious in their generations long battle for survival and are staunchly holding their ground.

Airborne gas attacks have proven ineffective. Unhindered, they roam free under cover of darkness, literally seeping from the woodwork. Attempts to poison their food supply have failed. Why not try biological warfare?

This is not the essay question on a West Point entrance exam, it is the reasoning behind the development of a new form of cockroach control. Hiam Gunner, a professor of environmental science at UMass, has pioneered a way of eliminating the pests using a naturally occurring fungus developed by Ecoscience Corp., a company he and his wife co-founded in 1982.

Gunner said when he first came to the University in 1963, the environmental science community was concerned about the use of synthetic chemical pesticides.

"We wondered... why is it that pesticides aren't biodegradable," he said.

Under pressure from environmentalists, agricultural chemical companies shifted from their original pesticides to a group called oranophosphates, he said. These new pesticides did break down, but the residual compounds left behind were after even more harmful than the original. Gunner set out to find a "greener" alternative to these synthetic chemicals.

Gunner targeted cockroaches because the pest resides within human habitats and the poisons used to control them remain there whether they are effective or not. Often they are not.

To add to the danger of these pesticides, "the biggest repositories of roaches are in places where food is stored," he said.

"Roaches are ubiquitous," said Gunner. "They get into the most extraordinary places."

He explained that in many cases it is inconvenient or impossible to evacuate the building in order to exterminate the pests residing in "homes, restaurants, warehouses, cafeterias. . . or university housing for instance."

Cockroaches are worthy opponents, said Gunner, because "they are clever enough to avoid the bait."

When poisoned food is used, only those foolish enough to dine at the roach motels are killed, he said. Aerosols only kill those that actually come into contact with the spray and cockroaches also build up a resistance to these forms of chemical warfare.

Gunner said it only takes one genetic mutation and the pesticide becomes ineffective.

Gunner found the weapon he was looking for in the insect's natural environment. He identified an organism that was the roach's natural enemy. The fungus he chose was nothing new, he said, guessing that it was discovered as long ago as 1878.

His contribution was to develop strains of Entemopathogenic fungi aggressive enough to kill the pests. The fungus breaks down the insect and uses it for food.

"When you say that it 'eats' the roach it sounds like it has jaws," he said. "Instead the fungus produces enzymes which digest the beetle."

Gunner described his initial attempts to find a market for the product as "entirely unsuccessful."

Large agricultural chemical companies were not interested in his ecological war-on-bugs, because pesticides are twice as profitable to these companies bulk chemical sales, he explained.

Turned down by existing pesticide companies he founded his own.

"In the spirit of true American entrepreneurship, we mortgaged our house," said Gunner, and enlisted the help of the University's Small Business Center.

He secured additional funding in 1986 from a Massachusetts company called BioVentures, which seeks to help jumpstart biotechnology firms in the state. Money, however, was not the only hurdle to overcome.

"It took us a while to figure out how to deliver it," said Gunner. The parasite had to get on to the roach and stay there — if it could be groomed or scraped off it would not be effective. Ecoscience Corp. developed a chamber in which the fungus is placed and incubated, like a petri dish, then sealed until opened by the consumer. Gunner claimed it has a shelf life of up to two years.

The fungus is effective because the cockroaches who have picked up the fungus become "vectors." They are carriers, explained Gunner, and transmit it to others in the colony. They are unlikely to develop resistance to the parasite.

It is much more difficult to "outgrow" a living organism than to grow a poison, he said, because it would take many more mutations. There is a "co-evaluation" which goes on between the fungus and the roach; while the host is changing, the parasite changes too. If the bugs ever did develop an immunity, other strains of the fungus could quickly be substituted.

Forum to discuss civil rights issues

By A.R. SANTIAGO
Collegian Staff

Racial and religious conflict on college campuses will be the topic of an informal fact-finding session by a civil rights commission scheduled to meet today at the Campus Center.

"Campus Tensions: In Search of Solutions for the '90s" will be held from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. in CC room 917.

Representatives from various students groups, such as ALANA and the Collegian, as well as selected faculty members and administrators from the University of Massachusetts and Smith College will be on hand to offer testimony regarding the issue to a panel from the Massachusetts Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Deirdre Almeida, acting chair of the Massachusetts Advisory Committee, anticipates a "very large turnout" of students from UMass alone.

Jury indicts brother in Stuart case

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A grand jury said Thursday it had enough proof to support the theory that Charles Stuart murdered his pregnant wife in October 1989, and the panel indicted Stuart's brother for hiding evidence.

The Suffolk County grand jury indicted Matthew Stuart for conspiracy to obstruct justice and compounding a felony. A friend, John McMahon, was indicted for being an accessory to murder after the fact.

Matthew Stuart and McMahon told authorities more than a year ago that they disposed of the murder weapon, a .38-caliber pistol that was stolen from a safe at the fur shop where Charles Stuart worked.

The indictments cap a nearly two-year investigation of the bizarre murder case that amazed the nation. It first appeared to be the story of a loving suburban couple whose lives were shattered by a nightmarish attack. But then the case turned into a twisted tale of a man plotting to kill his wife.

Implicit in the charges is the grand jury's belief that Charles Stuart killed his wife, Carol, the night of Oct. 23, .989, after the couple left a birthing class at a Boston hospital, said David Rodman, spokesman for the Suffolk

The fungus is specific to cockroaches and cannot hurt other animals, said Gunner. To meet EPA regulations, it was tested independently at the University of Southern California and in Florida and Kentucky. He said the product was tested in "real houses," with people living in them and "their roach problems were incredible."

Though this is Ecoscience Corp.'s first product, "we have others in the pipeline," he said. "This is a core technology that we can build on."

Future products will employ the same idea of finding a pest's natural enemy. A fly chamber is in the works, as well as products for orchard produce.

"You know those beautiful blue molds that grow on oranges?" asked Gunner. "We've developed ways to prevent apples, pears, and citrus fruits from rotting. Its called post-harvest protection."

Ecoscience has secured a contract from Rousell, a French company, which has licensed, and will be marketing the product out of New Jersey. The roach killer is expected to go to market sometime next year.

"We have pioneered [this technology]," said Gunner, "[Ecoscience Corp.] has taken out some very strong patents."

But should they be successful, his "mom and pop" pesticide plant might soon have many emulators.

Story throws hat in ring

Amherst resident seeks Rosenberg seat

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Less than two days after Amherst State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg's election to the State Senate, candidates are already lining up to succeed him.

Ellen Story, a former Amherst-Pelham School Committee member, announced her candidacy for the Democratic nomination for state representative for the Amherst-Pelham district yesterday.

Speaking at a noon press conference at the Amherst Town Common, Story said she will strive to be "a fresh voice for tough times."

State Representative Candidate Ellen Story

It was a gloomy, overcast day, Story said, but when she got up to announce her candidacy, the sun started to shine. It was a "good omen," she said.

All of the four Democratic candidates vying for the seat, including Story, worked on Rosenberg's campaign for State Senate. Jon Hite and Stephen Bloomfield of Amherst and Norman Page of Pelham are all unofficial candidates for the position.

Rosenberg's seat was vacated after his resounding victory over Northampton attorney Douglas Dagarin on Sept. 24.

Story, the associate director of the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts, pledged to be "a forceful, progressive, independent advocate for the issues that matter to this district."

Her primary motivation in running was the issue of supporting a "well-funded" University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which Story labeled the largest employer in Western Massachusetts.

"As the University suffers, so does the rest of the community," Story said.

She explained how UMass has shed its "ZooMass" image and has become "a place renowned for scholarship and teaching.

"Now, I think people are proud to be associated with the University," Story said.

One of her major goals will be to sustain the school's reputation by returning funding levels to their 1988 levels.

"Getting more money for the University is not impossible," Story said.

Story has also promised to fight for more state aid for the area public schools and for improved "human services."

She also has a long involvement with women's rights and abortion rights causes. She has worked for the Family Planning Council since it's inception in 1973.

Story feels the district will benefit from someone who is not a standard politician. "I am a concerned political citizen," Story said, "not a politician."

News Briefs

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Springfield teachers have rejected a proposed one-year contract that included bonuses for some teachers but no base pay hikes.

Melanie Kasparian, president of the 1,800-member teachers union, said the contract was rejected Wednesday in a 450-300 vote.

The union bargaining team now want to return to the table to attempt to reach an agreement the teachers could support, she said.

CHICOPEE (AP) — Skeletal remains found in the Arizona desert as those of a 39-year-old man, who disappeared on a motorcycle trip two years ago.

Officials say the remains were identified last month by Walter Birkby, a University of Arizona professor, as those of Richard Couture.

Birkby told the Union-News of Springfield that the identification was confirmed through X-rays and by superimposing the skull onto a photograph of Couture.

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Federal authorities have dropped bank robbery charges against a North Adams man.

Edward P. Walker, 39, was arrested Sept. 5 in an Aug. 26 heist at the Pittsfield Cooperative Bank after his estranged wife told authorities the man pictured in bank photographs of the robbery resembled Walker.

"When I saw him I had doubts," said Jeffrey Kinder, an assistant U.S. attorney, who had asked the charge to be dropped against Walker last week when he appeared in U.S. District Court here.

Yiddish Center evicted by town

By JOSEPH REINERT
Collegian Staff

The National Yiddish Book Center, the world's largest repository of out-of-print Yiddish books, will be relocating this spring due to a Town of Amherst decision not to renew its lease.

The center, currently located at the old East Street School in Amherst, has plans to move to an unspecified spot in either South Hadley or Amherst for the next two years until permanent accomodations are ready at Hampshire College.

The Town of Amherst did not renew the center's lease earlier this year at the request of the school board, which wants to turn the building back into a school to accomodate the increasing number of students in the Amherst area.

Steven Hays, executive director of the center, said they were prepared for the move.

"We knew when we moved in here that the school department might need us to move, in case of over-enrollment," Hays said. "That was in 1980."

The old East Street School was the most logical choice to take the spill-over of students, said Michael Chernoff, chairperson of the Amherst School Committee.

"We voted to use the East Street School over a few other town buildings for a number of reasons," Chernoff said.

"It will be financially and physically easier to convert to classrooms. It is centrally located near the area with the highest population growth of students," Chernoff said. "And it is across the street from the Fort River School, which has a cafeteria for the East Street School to use."

Chernoff added that the center, "has kept up the building very well."

With the lease scheduled to end June 1, 1992, the school will be renovated over the summer to be ready for students by the fall of 1992. School officials have not decided which grades will be attending the school.

Meanwhile, The National Yiddish Book Center will continue to function. Hayes said the center's patron's "generally tend to be of three kinds: recreational Yiddish readers, scholars who are writing texts and libraries looking to add to specific book sections, for example, Holocaust literature."

Hays also said that "all of the Center's books are either donated or are 'rescued' from the trash. We are a non-profit organization which is the only one of our kind in the world."

BOG debates craft shop

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

In a much more civil Board of Governors meeting compared to years' past, the board passed several resolutions Thursday night and debated a lengthy proposal concerning the now-closed Student Union Craft Shop.

"The board has really reoriented itself toward its true functions," said Ben Preston, the vice-chairperson. "[The meeting] demonstrated that the BOG is really moving."

The BOG, which oversees campus events in the Campus Center and Student Union, passed motions revising the building key policy for Registered Student Organizations, revising the previously "too general" BOG coordinator job descriptions, approving a revised Vending Policy for tables on the concourse in the Campus Center to improve diversity and revised the poster and banner policy.

Gov. Paul McGonnigal presented to the BOG a proposal to revise the management policy of the Student Union Craft Shop, which is currently closed while a professional director is being hired by the Student Activities Office.

The proposal, which was tabled until next week, would implement a plan to have either two graduate students or a half-time professional working with a 20 hour graduate student to manage the shop.

"It is under our auspices," McGonnigal said. "The issue here is saving student money." He said the implemented proposal could save the University close to $13,000.

"I'm no raving fan of arts and crafts. It's really a fiscal issue," McGonnigal said, also stressing that the University's Craft Shop is "one of the finest in the nation."

Bill Harris, the director of the Campus Center, questioned the efficiency of a craft shop run by graduate students who have great time commitments. Harris also opposed the bill because of its poor "timing" and called it "premature."

Harris also said the SAO has had no chance to react to the proposal. McGonnigal said two SAO officials were invited to the meeting but did not come.

Cuts force co-payments

Vanin defends health fee increases

By JESSAME HANNUS
Collegian Staff

The shrinking student body, budget cuts and fees cut by the Board of Trustees forced the administration to institute a co-payment policy at University Health Services this semester, University of Massachusetts administrators told the Faculty Senate yesterday.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin, who oversees Health Services, said the only other alternative open was to decrease services.

Sarah Lyon, treasurer of the Graduate Student Senate, said graduate students objected to the lack of student input concerning the co-payments.

The co-payments include a $10 charge for surgical visits and visits to the urgent care ward between the hours of 9 p.m. and 8a.m., and $10 charge for weekend and late evening visits. Students may be charged up to $50 for certain prescriptions and $25 for a physical examination.

Although there are several campus-wide committees that oversee Health Services, it is unknown if the committees discussed the issue. Student leaders are still trying to determine who sits on these committees.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien agreed that "consultation was indeed very limited, but we were operating under a severe time bind."

O'Brien said in the future, "we will do our best to have prior consultation."

He also said the administration has been doing a much better job of consulting the students than in the past but admitted it is still not great.

The change in numbers of teacher assistants and undergraduate students between fall 1990 and fall 1991 was also discussed by faculty members.

According to statistics presented the number of "full-time teaching equivalent" TAs has decreased by 17.3 percent and the total number of TAs has declincd to 1,344 from 1,487. At the same time the number of undergraduates at UMass has only decreased by 3 percent.

PLO compromises remove barriers to Middle East peace conference

By WILLIAM C. MANN
Associated Press

ALGIERS, Algeria — PLO leaders agreed Thursday to compromises that would give them a behind-the-scenes role at the peace talks, officials said. The concessions could remove the last major obstacles to convening the proposed talks.

The decision is not expected to lessen the PLO's influence over delegates to the peace talks or their objectives.

The compromise moves Thursday were made by PLO faction leaders and members of its Executive Committee, which must vote to formally approve them. It was not known when a vote would be taken.

Within the PLO, the moves could test the strength of chairman Yasser Arafat, who faced growing opposition to compromise from hard-liners and his own mainstream Fatah faction.

The PLO officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the decision to compromise was made after studying assurances from Secretary of State James A. Baker III, including a pledge to work toward a Palestinian homeland and to pressure Israel to halt construction of Jewish settlements in the occupied territories.

The officials said PLO leaders decided to support a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation to peace talks that includes Palestinians only from the Israeli-occupied territories.

The leaders also decided to allow the Jordanians or another Palestinian group to formally announce the participants, the officials said. It is expected the PLO will play a major role in choosing the delegates and setting their negotiation strategy.

The United States has assured the PLO that Palestinians would get equal footing with the Jordanians and be recognized as a distinct group, the officials said.

The United States also guaranteed its backing of Palestinian autonomy in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip under a three-year timetable, rather than the five-year plan outlined in the 1978 Camp David accords, the sources said.

The United States has been trying for months to bridge the gap between Israel and the Palestinians over representation at the proposed October peace conference.

Israel has said it will not agree to participants from Arab east Jerusalem, which it captured in 1967 and later annexed, saying that it would call into question its sovereignty over the united city. It also refuses to allow participants from the PLO, which it considers a terrorist group.

The Palestine National Council, the PLO's parliament-in-exile, has been meeting in Algiers since Monday to work out its position on the proposed conference.

PLO spokesmen would not comment on Thursday's moves. Arafat is expected to address the issue at a news conference Saturday.

In Washington, Baker said, "We have worked very hard to encourage Palestinians from the territories to take advantage of this opportunity to engage directly with Israel. We hope that they will do so."

The latest decisions came after Arafat and other officials met with two Palestinian envoys from the occupied territories, the officials said. They said Faisal Husseini and Hanan Ashrawi, from east Jerusalem and the West Bank, came to Algiers to report on their series of talks with Baker.

County district attorney's office.

Charles Stuart, who was also shot that night, told police he and his wife were attacked by a mugger. His gripping description of the attack in an emergency call from his car phone caught attention around the country.

The couple's prematurely born son died 17 days after the shooting.

But more than two month's later, on Jan 3, 1990, Matthew Stuart came forward and told police that his brother staged the crime. Charles Stuart then became the prime suspect, and the next morning he plunged off Boston's Tobin Bridge in an apparent suicide.

"We plan to fight this," Nacy Gertner, Matthew Stuarts's lawyer, who noted that her client pointed authorites to Charles Stuart in the first place.

"Had Charles Stuart lived, there is no doubt, there can be no doubt, that Matthew would never, never be prosecuted," Gertner said.

While Matthew Stuart was an accomplice, Massachusetts law prevents a family member from being charged as an accessory to a crime after the fact.

In his story to police, Matthew Stuart said he believed he was assisting in a possible insurance scam when he agreed to meet his brother in Boston's Mission Hill Neighborhood.

Wrestlers urged to use caution against risk of Herpes infection

BOSTON (AP) — Wrestlers should be checked for skin sores before tournaments because of the risk they will spread herpes infections during their grappling, health officials warn.

In a report published Thursday, Minnesota doctors described an outbreak of this form of herpes — known as herpes gladiatorum — at a high school wrestling camp two years ago. One-third of the boys came down with herpes rashes during the four-week camp.

Herpes gladiatorum is caused by herpes simplex virus type 1, the same virus responsible for cold sores. Rather than being confined to the lips, however, these sores are scattered over victims' faces, chests, arms and legs and are spread by skin-to-skin contact.

"The key to minimizing this infection is early recognition and removal of infected wrestlers from competition and practice," said Dr. Edward A. Belongia of the Minnesota Department of Health, who investigated the outbreak.

He said wrestlers with any kind of skin sores should be removed from play until doctors determine whether they are infectious. And coaches should check their players regularly for herpes rashes.

The often painful rashes usually looks like clusters of blisters surrounded by red skin. They typically heal in a week or two, but can be spread during most of this time.

First-time victims also frequently have fever, chills and other flu-like discomfort. As with other herpes infections, the sores may come back from time to time after the initial encounter.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Black enough for you

First off, I would like to say to the Homeboy who yesterday indirectly accused me of "not being Black" (you know who you are), that I thank you for throwing me that off-handed comment, because otherwise this editorial wouldn't have been written. As pissed as I was that you said it, and didn't have the balls to confront me and discuss the matter of my "Blackness", it brought up something that I no longer will allow to irritate me, hence my little speech.

Saad Hopkins

For starters Yes, I am Black! Any idiot could see that as it is as obvious as day. And, as other Black-skinned people have realized, I don't plan to wake up tomorrow morning and find that my skin has changed its color. The thought of someone mistaking me for White is not only degrading, but is also completely messed up.

Now that we've established that, let's get down to the real core of the issue. Admittedly, I am different than others who may be African-American. I don't like MC Hammer. I don't have a black, flat top haircut. I don't wear Air Jordans and I despise wearing any kind of jewelry. If this sounds like my stereotypical view of the African-American male, you're right — yet keep in mind I would never mean this in a bad way.

However, I also feel as if I've been stereotyped by my own kind in an insulting and hurtful manner. Ignorance is the leading cause, plus some feel inferior to me.

If you're hip enough to notice, or if you've heard through the grapevine, I'm gay. And I'm as proud of my sexuality as I am my ethnic denomination. Yet, I'm still disrespected, and even attacked, by some members of the Black community. They claim that my being gay is turning my back on "400 years of repressed Black masculinity."

This is the most disturbing and outrageous criticism I have ever experienced in my 23 years of being on this earth! And I have been lucky to have been strong enough for taking a breath and trying to dispel this myth within my brothers, instead of crying on cue.

On the lighter side, some brothers haven't been too uncomfortable with my being gay. However, a different problem arises. They ask me if I'm gay and Black, why am I not going out with a Black gay man? For one, I only know of three or four openly Black gay men in the entire Five-College system. Secondly, if I were attracted to a Black man, and he were gay, you could bet I'd go after him in a heartbeat. In short, the campus could use a few Essex Hemphils (and should they come, send them my way!).

As a Black male on this campus, I plead with other African-Americans to just come up and talk to me instead of continuing to live in fear. As many differences as we may have, you'd be surprised how many similarities there are. You may beg to differ, but I am Black enough for you!

Spike Lee once said that Black people are the most divided people on the face of the earth. This observation is not only sad, but true. And if we can't face up to, and try to understand, our differences, yet still somehow remain a "unit", future African-Americans will be saying this same thing for generations to come.

Elitism becomes annoying

As another week passes and the fine students of this University prepare for another weekend filled with drunken bliss, the author feels that it is appropriate to address the elitism of certain individuals who happen to take themselves too seriously. In this essay, the author will address the problem of the elite, try to trace the roots of these elitists and, finally, hope to alleviate the problem.

Michael Morrissey

The problem itself is that people here (at UMass) can tend to take themselves too seriously. These people are our girl/boy friends, our RAs, our roommates, our neighbors and our professors. They can be anyone who believes themselves to be holier-than-thou.

Times are tough at UMass, and we need to stick together, not tear each other apart. One of the best things about this campus is that there are so many people here that one can either gravitate towards their own types or seek out different people with different ideas. The problem arises when people think that their ideas, or perceptions, are better than others.

Believe it or not, everyone here has a brain to think with. If we don't take time to hear the "common guy/gal's" opinions, then what good does having having two ears do?

The root of the problem is that these elitists are very self-centered, egotistical people who immediately play on stereotypes. They were coddled and spoiled as children, and were never told to A) chill out; or B) get off your high horse. Obviously, there is a time to be serious, and a time to fool around. The author feels that having to endure such drivel is too much of a burden.

The reader may ask, "What, pray tell, is the solution?". The only solution to ignorance is education. We must inform these pious louts that we're not going to take any more! I, for one, am sick of people who can't even start a polite discussion without shoving their ideas down my throat.

I come from a different perspective than you, so of course I may have different views. However, you don't have to accept my views, so don't ask me to accept yours. Stereotypical or prejudiced opinions bother me, and these are more likely to be spewed out by the elite than by common students who live and thrive here.

The only other thing I can say besides trying to tell them to shut up is this: just take it as a joke, especially if they're serious. Hopefully, at some point, they'll pass out.

In conclusion, I, (I mean the author) would like to thank the students here for staying cool through this tough time. Don't take people's crap who won't give you credit; you're basically beating the clock for your degrees, before the reputation of the University decreases even more and the buildings that you live and work in collapse.

Things like budget cuts and the decline of UMass are serious; people with nothing better to do except stand on their soapboxes and criticize us aren't. They're a joke.

People who spend their free time tearing other students apart are sad. That's why I don't take them seriously.

Article distorts Middle East

The leaders of powerful nations are conspiring in Star Chambers to plot the demise of their unfortunate neighbors, a vast network of secret funds is being diverted to sinister ends and the Middle East is bordering on a conflict that will shake the world and leave the evil empire in undisputed global hegemony.

Such intricate plots can only be found in two places: a Tom Clancy novel, like Red Storm Rising, or a Hussein Ibish editorial, like "Death of a Nation." The difference between them is that Mr. Clancy extrapolates from factual sources while Mr. Ibish places more emphasis on demagoguery and trusts in a lack of loyal opposition. Well, no more. To be fair, there were some aspects of his article that were tangential to the truth, but I'm sure this was merely accidental; many were wide of the mark. Two distortions should serve as indications of the magnitude of the remainder.

The "1967 War," in reality the Six Day War, began when Israel obtained direct visual evidence that Egypt was in the process of arming strike aircraft for a surprise attack. Six days later, Israel had defeated Egypt, Jordan and Syria, in the process capturing the Sinai. This was not a "war for land," as Mr. Ibish would have us believe. It was clearly defensive war and the vast majority of the captured territory — including the Suez Canal — was returned in exchange for Egyptian guarantees of peace.

Numerous references were made to "Israeli racism" and "Israeli apartheid." Mr. Ibish has belittled the legitimate struggle for freedom by South Africans by equating the oppressive system they live under to the democratic Israeli government. Apartheid is a system of legal disenfranchisement based on race, composed of the Reservation of Separate Amenities Act, the Bantu Education Act and the Group Areas Act, to name a few.

The Israeli constitution, on the other hand, calls upon the Arab inhabitants to "play their part in building the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its institutions." They don't sound the same to me. How about you?

When fact becomes fantasy, then Mr. Ibish, does "vision become illusion?" When polemics become propaganda, we cease to be educated and begin to be indoctrinated.

Lack of sympathy at university health services leaves student hurting

We've all been insulted at some time in our lives. I've been insulted more than once or twice, but never so badly as I was at our very own University Health Services Urgent Care this morning.

As I was cutting something, the knife that I was using slipped and sliced my finger, causing blood to gush everywhere. After about an hour of applied pressure, my finger was still bleeding, so I called Health Services to see if I should come in. The lady (and I use that term loosely) who answered the phone listened to my story only to reply (with just enough sarcasm to make me feel stupid), "That's unusual (as if I were lying). It should be fine." I asked if I should be checked if it continued to bleed. Her answer? "If you want."

After a while my roommate brought me in. Joan (name changed to protect identity) introduced herself as the one who spoke to me. "Well, let me see it," she said with a sigh. I started to unwrap my bloody towel and before I completely removed it Joan gave her diagnosis: "Well, you don't need stitches. If you want we can bandage it for you but (with a chuckle) why don't you save yourself $10 and put a Band-aid on it."

My roommate and I could not believe how rude this supposed professional was. I grew up to believe that medical professionals (having two members in my family) had kindness and sympathy. I wasn't asking for a band of violinists to appear but a little compassion would have been appropriate. Joan made me feel as if I had a paper cut and ran crying for help.

Well, it is now 9 hours later and my finger is still bleeding on and off, but thanks to Joan's expert advice, I'm sure I'll be fine. I guess it's best that Joan is employed in Urgent Care and not on the Suicide Help Line. I can see it now: "Well, don't take all those pills, you idiot. Save yourself five bucks and jump out the window."

Column about hunting makes generalizations

Shawn McDonnell's biased editorial ["Guns don't kill, the dismembered animal fairy does," Sept. 25] should not go unchallenged. Emotional anti-hunting accounts such as his make interesting newsprint, but it is obvious that Mr. McDonnell knows very little about nature, hunting, or populations of wild animals.

Contrary to Mr. McDonnell's commentary, New England wildlife is subject to overpopulation, particularly among white-tailed deer. In the absence of predation (animals killing other animals), deer numbers increase to levels that cannot be supported by the natural environment. The results of this overpopulation are starving deer, depletion of human crops by starving animals and increased incidence of Lyme disease in people. In fact, suburban communities that ban hunting within their borders often regret their decision when their children are crippled with the effects of Lyme disease.

Hunting is the most effective way of controlling these (animal) populations. There is archeological evidence that deer evolved their rapid population growth in response to hunting pressure from Native Americans. Yes, people have been hunting for a long time and fortunately a significant segment of our society continues to do so.

Mr. McDonnell's generalization of all hunters being "bloody-faced" drunken killers only weakens his argument. As a wildlife biology student and one of many law-abiding hunters, I am offended by his ignorance.

New shows enter this fall's TV lineup

By JON LUPO
Collegian Correspondent

Remember last fall when television was trumpeting its innovation and dedication to quality, its quest for creativity and freshness? Probably not. Out of the 33 new shows that premiered last fall, only eight have made it through one season.

Forget innovation: Twin Peaks is gone. Forget quality: China Beach is no more. In their place: sitcoms, buddy-cop shows and reality programs. Television is desperately holding on to its older series'; witness a 14th season for Knots Landing and a 10th for Cheers, still the number one show to beat.

NBC's once-mighty Thursday night lineup is dwindling, and now CBS's Monday night is the formidable foe. One would think that television would be trying anything, what with the growth of video cassettes, cable, and Fox, to win back viewers and to hold on to the few they have.

Mostly, it's old faces in new shows: Carol Burnett, Redd Fox, James Garner, Robert Guillaume, and Suzanne Somers. Wow! All that and another season of Jake and the Fatman! For what it's worth, here's a rundown of this fall's pickings . . .

MONDAY: Nothing new here. CBS is sticking with its usual schedule, as is NBC, while ABC has Monday Night Football. You might want to check out the new set of Designing Women. Delta Burke's out and Julia Duffy (Newhart) and Jan Hooks (Saturday Night Live) are in. Northern Exposure is on at 10 p.m., and if you're into suicide, there's always Major Dad.

TUESDAY: NBC has I'll Fly Away, a family drama about a Southern attorney and his family during the 1950's. It's supposed to be very heavy stuff and it goes head to head with the annoying, but ever so cute Full House at 8 p.m., so either it will be moved to another time or it'll be gone by November. ABC has what many people think will be a sure hit in Home Improvement. It stars stand-up comic Tim Allen as the host of a home fix-it show who is really clumsy at home. It's pretty funny, but once the show runs out of material from Allen's stand up routine, it may go flat.

ABC also has high hopes for its thirtysomething replacement at 10 p.m. with Homefront, a thinly disguised soap opera about returning WWII soldiers. This is not the right time for a soap opera, but this one's from the producers of Knot's Landing, so don't count it out yet.

WEDNESDAY: CBS is rolling out two new comedies, and by the looks of them, they won't be on for long. First up is Redd Fox in The Royal Family. He plays a gruff retiree opposite Della Reese. Their daughter and her family move in, much to their consternation. Oh! I can see the many sitcom possibilities forming right now! But anything is better than the show that follows The Royal Family, Teech. Teech is about a cool black teacher who gets a job in a stuffy boys' prep school. This has music woven into its storylines. Does anyone remember last season's Hull High? Huh? Then no one will remember this one.

ABC has big name talent behind and in front of the cameras for its two new comedies. James L. Brooks (The Simpsons) has created Sibs, starring Marsha Mason and Alex Rocco. It's about three sisters who go through the trials and tribulations of life. The show is both sharp and funny, a very good combination these days.

Producer Susan Harris (The Golden Girls) will attempt to recreate the serialized farce she mastered in Soap in her new show, Good and Evil. Margaret Whitton and Terri Garr play a good and a bad sister, respectively. If you liked Soap and think the rather bawdy humor of The Golden Girls is funny, you should like this one.

THURSDAY: At the Emmy Awards this year, actor James Earl Jones won the Best Actor in a Drama Series for his work on Gabriel's Fire. Maybe it wasn't such a good idea to revamp the show and make it more funny. You can be the

Brown Bag Latina lunch

By MARC LUMPKIN
Collegian Correspondent

A literary renaissance of Latina fiction is writing its way into the New York mainstream, but the climb to success is tough for many authors because they have to fight stereotypes, language barriers, and an identity crisis, according to University of Massachusetts comparative literature professor Ellen McCracken.

McCracken outlined the plight of Latina Fiction writers Wednesday afternoon to nearly twenty students and faculty at the Women's Studies Brown Bag Lunch Series. This is the sixth season in the lecture series which explores important gender, race and class issues.

Latina fiction includes literary works by Chicano, Puerto Rican and Dominican women that were born in the United States.

According to McCracken, Latina fiction is experiencing a "renaissance within a renaissance."

She explained that the late 1960s and 70s produced a Chicano Renaissance of primarily Latino (men) writers in the southwestern United States, while the 1960s have given birth to Latina (women) writers into the rest of the U.S. mainstream.

McCracken said most of the Latina writing began on university campuses with poetry and short stories and later developed into long narratives.

McCracken said that Latina writers use their novels to fight stereotypes or "partial knowledge," which are views of the Latina community taken by the majority of the United States,

McCracken sees this enlightenment of the Latina community as a positive motive, which she calls an "assertion of identity" However, this search for identity sometimes becomes exapggerated, she said, when Latina authors focus on individual conflicts rather than ethnic and community issues.

For example, McCracken said that in one certain Latina novel a young woman deals with life at Berkeley in the 60s and the struggles she and her ethnic community face. However, the second half of the book deals with the woman's personal, romantic life and the decisions she must make between two inconsequential men, according to McCracken.

"I'm arguing that you can't find identity on one mountain alone. You must do it in relation to the people around you," she said.

One of the most obvious problems Latina writers face in the United States is overcoming the language barrier. One student at the lecture, who is also a Latina writer, explained this problem best.

judge , as Gabriel's Fire becomes Pros & Cons. It's more of a buddy show, complete with Richard Crenna, and a lighter tone as well. Fox will follow The Simpsons at 8 p.m. with Drexell's Class starring Dabney Coleman as a con-artist who has to teach fourth grade in order to pay off his debt to society. Kind of lame and stupid. I mean, how idiotic is it to have a convict teaching kids?

As if we needed another reality show with an over-the-hill actor, ABC is presenting Pernell Roberts (a.k.a. Trapper John, M.D.) in F.B.I.: The Untold Stories at 9 p.m., opposite Cheers. I'm sure many people will be watching it.

FRIDAY: With Friday being the least watched TV night of the week, all the networks are desperate for hits. Six, count 'em, six new series are scheduled. Ready? Here we go: CBS has Princesses, starring Julie Hagerty, Twiggy Lawson, and Fran Drescher as three women sharing an apartment in New York. CBS had so much faith in Brooklyn Bridge that it ordered the new sitcom solely on the basis of a script. The script was by creator Gary David Goldberg (Family Ties) and it's about the wonder years 1956 starring Marion Ross, the good 'ol mom from Happy Days. Don't forget the Carol Burnett Show, also from CBS. This will be a return to those great variety shows of the past. I'll have to see it to believe it.

One more for CBS: Palace Guard, starring D.W. Moffett and Marcy Walker (Santa Barbara) as a former hotel thief and a former actress who now solve crimes at a resort. They hate each other in the beginning, but how much do you want to bet they'll love each other somewhere down the road? Palace Guard is a lot like NBC's Reasonable Doubts, although the latter has bigger stars, but still the standard "I hate you, I love you, I hate you" plot. Deaf actress Marlee Matlin (A Best Actress Oscar winner) plays a D.A. to Mark Harmon's tough cop in this slick romantic thriller.

The producers of Cheers have come up with NBC's Flesh 'N' Blood starring David Keith as a hick con man who moves in with his long lost sister played by Lisa
Darr. And finally, here's the story of a lovely lady . . . it's Brady Bunch revisited in Step by Step, the latest comedy from the producers of Full House and Family Matters. Suzanne Somers and Patrick Duffy play newlyweds with kids who aren't exactly Marcia, Greg, et. al. (P.S.: It's funnier than you think.)

SATURDAY: NBC is shuffling around The Golden Girls and Empty Nest to made room for two new series. The first is The Torkelsons, a family comedy about life seen through the eyes of a very grown up 14-year-old girl. Also on NBC is Nurses, which is set in the same hospital as Empty Nest, so expect occasional visits from Dr. Weston and Laverne, as well as some golden girls. This one's not as funny as either of its predecessors, but it's not half bad.

ABC offers Michael Chiklis as The Commish, a comedy/action series about a loveable police commissioner. The Commish occupies China Beach's old time slot, so it has some big shoes to fill. On the decidedly lighter and stupid side are Greg Evigan and Connie Selleca in P.S.I. Luv U. It seems that Evigan, a cop, and Selleca, a con artist, are forced to pose as husband and wife in the witness protection program and work for a detective agency to support themselves. 'Nuff said.
